THE VOICE IN THE WILDERNESS (Special—Two Parts—May 27).—Frank, a young author, living in the city, is unable to concentrate his mind on his work, and much to his wife's disgust, decides to spend a few months in a small village, where there will be nothing to distract him. After some controversy he persuades her to accompany him, and they retire to a small lifeless town, where they rent a cottage on the outskirts. After living this mode of life for some time, Irene becomes very much dissatisfied and pleads with him to return to the city, but he refuses. One day while in deep thought, strolling alone in the woods, Frank steps over a precipice, but fortunately alights on a ledge, which, without a doubt, saves his life. His plunge is witnessed by Gerda, a young sculptress, who lives alone in a cabin nearby. She also has come to this lonely spot to seek solitude for her work. She drags his unconscious form to her cabin, where she nurses him for several weeks before he is able to sit up and talk. In the meantime, searching parties had been organized in the village, but no trace of the missing author found. After a few weeks of fruitless searching, they give up and conclude that he had been killed. Irene receives a letter, telling her that she has fallen heir to her uncle's vast estate and that she is to come immediately to occupy the home. Before departing she leaves a note with the village storekeeper, who places it in a small jug for safe keeping in case Frank ever returned. In this note she tells why she is leaving and where she is going.

Gerda has fallen in love with Frank and is very much distressed when he asks her to go to the village and locate his wife, if possible. At the village they tell her that Frank had been killed and that his wife had gone to the city. She keeps silent as to Frank's whereabouts. While in town she purchases a jug—the jug in which the old storekeeper had placed the note from Irene, and then forgotten where he had put it. Upon returning to her cabin, she tells Frank that his wife has deserted him. This is a terrible blow, but he decides to remain and continue his work rather than try to find her. They live in this manner for months, each day bringing them closer together. One day the unused jug which Gerda had purchased fell from a shelf and broke, disclosing the note from Irene. Frank reads it and reprimands Gerda for lying to him. Unheeding her plea for him to remain with her, he goes to the city in search of his wife. In the meantime, Irene thinking her husband dead, promises to marry another man, and Frank arrives just in time to witness the wedding ceremony through a window. Rather than make things very unpleasant for his wife, he returns to the little log cabin in the woods, where Gerda greets him with open arms.

BLIND MAN'S BLUFF (May 26).—Shielby Rutherford lost his eyesight and Doctor Burton, a specialist, is probing by putting off the operation. Mr. Rutherford's daughter meets a young physician by the name of Grant, who volunteers to restore her father's eyesight secretly. He does so, exposing Dr. Burton as a detriment to the medical world and shows him up to Mr. Rutherford as trifling with his wife's affections. Ruth consents to marry Dr. Grant.

PAT CASEY'S CASE (May 27).—Pat Casey, an Irish laborer, is in love with his work. So much so, that he is fired ten minutes after he accepts a job. Besides his overwhelming desire for labor, he is inclined to be a fighter, and many the scrap he has. His wife finally secures him a job, but Pat gets lazy and pretends that he is ill. Two of the laborers carry him home and his wife puts him to bed. During the absence of his better half he bribes his daughter to give him a pie, which he devours. When his wife returns with the doctor, the physician informs him that he is not sick at all, only lazy. When his wife discovers that he has been playing possum she routs him out of the house and a merry chase takes place.

SOPHIE STARTS SOMETHING (May 28).—There is much objection to liquor being sold in Snakeville, and Sophie starts out to reform the town. With hatchet in hand, she compels the saloonkeepers to empty their stock in the gutter, which flows freely into the town's public well. It is strangely peculiar how everybody is seized with the desire for a drink of water. Many of the inhabitants who never would think of touching a drop of liquor, become excellent examples for a "wet" territory. There are many screamingly funny incidents in this production that are amusingly humorous.

BRONCHO BILLY'S CUNNING (May 30).—A detective from the East is sent West to locate a notorious bandit and train robber. In the costume of a Western cowpuncher he reaches a small town. He is injured by falling over a precipice. Broncho Billy finds him, carries him to his cabin and nurses him back to health. It is then that Broncho discovers that the detective is looking for him, and files the hammer of the detective's revolver, so that it will not touch the cap. The detective learns of Broncho's identity and tries to shoot him. The outlaw upbraids the detective for his unappreciative spirit and requests him to leave at the point of a gun.

WHEN THE LIGHTNING STRUCK (Special—Two Parts—May 29).—Ted and Tom were roommates at college. They were both in love with Irene. Ted is soon forgotten and Tom is warmly welcomed into the heart of the fair coed. Ted, who had an ungovernable temper, was madly in love with her, and the thought of his giving her up nearly drove him into distraction. He tries to forget, but in vain. It happened one day that the professor was explaining to the class, "the making of a time bomb" to be used for blasting. Ted took particular interest in this lecture and determined upon a plan.

A few days later Tom received a note from his sweetheart, stating that she would like to visit the laboratory and would meet him there at four o'clock the following afternoon. Ted had read the note before Tom got there. Jealousy took an upper hand and Ted placed a time bomb in the laboratory, connecting the wires with the clock, so that the bomb would explode at four o'clock and blow his roommate and the girl he loved to atoms. The next day it stormed. Tom tried to persuade Irene not to go, but she insisted. Ted arrived at the laboratory first—now completely insane—gloating over the terrible trick he was about to play. An odd freak of nature, in the way of lightning striking in the vicinity of the college, turned the hands of the clock ahead and a terrible disaster happened—killing Ted.

VITAGRAPH.

A SENTIMENTAL BURGLAR (May 25).—Thinking to retrieve his fortunes, Lord Goring, an impoverished peer, plans to marry his only daughter, Ethel, to the Duke of Allerton, a wealthy but dissipated sensualist. Ethel is in love with a young soldier, Lieutenant Holland Pursey, and pleads hard not to be forced into a marriage with the duke, but her father insists it is the only way, and to save him from ruin, she agrees. She marries Allerton, and lives a very unhappy life.

Pursey is ordered to South Africa with his regiment, and pleads for a chance to say farewell to Ethel. She promises to see him that night, and admits him by the garden window. Bill Garson, a burglar, gets into the house that night, sees the lovers, and hides. He overhears what they say and is touched by their determination to live uprightly despite their intense love for each other. Accidentally they discover him, but he warns them not to make any outcry, as they, too, will be found. Allerton, hearing a noise, awakens and goes down to the library. Bill, the burglar, is equal to the occasion. After hiding Pursey and Ethel, he gives Allerton a light blow with a bludgeon, rendering him unconscious, and makes his escape. The incident is laid to burglars, who succeeded in escaping.

Afterwards Pursey, interested in Bill's case, advises him to turn over a new leaf and be honest. Bill does so, and, to keep out of temptation, recruits for South Africa. While there he proves himself a hero and saves Pursey's life. Allerton is killed in the hunting field on the day that Ethel receives news that Pursey has been killed in South Africa. The news proves to be false, however, as he has only been wounded and nursed back to health by Bill. Pursey returns to Ethel, as one from the dead, and their happiness is as enduring as their love.

CUTEY'S WIFE (Special—Two Parts—May 26).—Cutey Dexter, a young man of wealth, becomes infatuated with Mlle. Denise, the leading woman of a small theatrical company, who schemes to ensnare him, thereby securing a wealthy husband and much free advertising for the show. Betty, a pupil in a fashionable school, runs away to become an actress. Miss Crab, the principal, starts out after her. Closely pursued, she desperately climbs into the nearest refuge—the window of Cutey's apartment. Mr. Dexter learns his son intends to marry an actress and goes in haste to see him. Betty hears Cutey coming and ducks into the wardrobe. A door closes and she thinks he has gone. Seeing him still there, she hastily dodges back, but is seen by Pa Dexter, as he enters the room. Mr. Dexter opens the wardrobe and Betty, terror-stricken, steps out. Cutey is speechless with amazement. Papa turns to him and says, "Thought you'd fool the old man, eh?"

Mr. Dexter thinks Betty is his new daughter-in-law. They do not undeceive him, and, deciding the boy has good taste anyway, he makes the best of it. Miss Crab arrives with a policeman, but Dexter orders them out, saying she is his son's wife. He then takes the supposed bride and groom to his home. Each blames the other for their predicament and they have a terrific quarrel. Pa Dexter undertakes the role of peacemaker, but becomes exasperated and locks them both in their room. He then calls up Judge Goodman, an old friend, and asks his help. Cutey and Betty calm down and by the time the judge arrives, are on better terms. He goes in to them, they explain matters and he says the only solution is an immediate marriage. The judge performs the ceremony, then steps out and tells Dexter "he persuaded them to make up." Betty and Cutey sit clasped in each other's arms while papa and the judge smile beneficently on them.

THE BOYS OF I. O. U. (May 27).—As the most conceited member of the I. O. U. College Fraternity, Wallie is the source of much amusement among the boys. They see him read the posters announcing the appearance of Mlle. Felice, a musical comedy star, and watch him buy flowers for her. They tell Bob, an old friend of Mlle. Felice, who has sent him a pass for a box at the show. "To put one over on Wallie," they all decide to go and leave him out. At the matinee they see Wallie in another box, his eyes glued on Mlle. Felice, and looking like a sick calf. After the show Bob and the boys call on her and ask her to make up as an old woman, explaining the little joke they have planned. At their suggestion she writes a note, thanking Wallie for his flowers and making an appointment to meet him that evening. Wallie is overjoyed, and while the others grin, he says, "They all fall for little Wallie."

That evening Wallie, "all dolled up," and carrying a bouquet, starts for the theater, followed cautiously by those in the secret. While he is waiting, with a "Be still, my heart," expression, Mlle. appears, in her old lady make-up. She takes the flowers from the stupefied Wallie, and smooths his hair with loving grimaces. He finally succeeds in excusing himself, only to find the boys barring his way. Mlle., unobserved, takes off the make-up and confronts Wallie. As a dazed expression of admiration comes over his face the boys shove him into the waiting auto, order the chauffeur to put on full speed, and poor Wallie is soon out of sight. Mlle. gets into her machine and the boys, still laughing, give a wild cheer for her. Their little joke on the self-important Wallie is a success.

HUNGER KNOWS NO LAW (May 28).—Desperately poor, with a family dependent upon him, Jim Brown becomes despondent. While walking through a private estate, he meets Madge, a young girl, and gains her everlasting gratitude by releasing her dog from a game-trap. Madge later meets the three children of Jim Brown, and learns through them of their poverty. Brown has become desperate and decides to disregard the game laws. Despite his wife's protests, he takes his gun and plunges into the woods. He brings down several birds, and the report of his gun is heard by a nearby game warden, and Dick Vernon, the young owner of the estate, who is in love with Madge. Brown, hearing them coming, dashes through the bushes, suddenly coming face to face with Madge. She determines to save him, and quickly transfers the birds from his pouch to the empty basket she is carrying. Vernon and the gamekeeper rush up and accuse Brown. He denies it, and Madge shields him. Vernon is puzzled, and, believing Brown guilty, searches his bag. Finding nothing, he angrily accuses Madge of protecting the man. Madge walks haughtily away.

Madge later hides the birds under some bushes. She hears Vernon coming and quickly straightens up, greeting him very coldly. Vernon's dog smells the game and hauls out one of the birds. His suspicious now confirmed, he accuses Madge of protecting a criminal and believes she is infatuated with the man.

One day Vernon follows her to the Brown cottage and learns the motive for her actions. Madge will not speak to him, but he begs forgiveness so humbly that she cannot resist his entreaties, and gives him his long sought answer.

MR. BUNNYHUG BUYS A HAT FOR HIS BRIDE (May 29).—After the honeymoon, Bunnyhug and his wife, Clara, have a quarrel, and he promises to buy her a new hat if she will grant him the privilege of smoking in the house. They see a beautiful creation for $85, and his wife insists unavailingly on his buying it. They have a worse quarrel than before, and Clara slips on a banana peel, spraining her ankle. She is carried home and put into a wheel chair. Bunnyhug remorsefully promises to get her the much desired hat at any cost. He tries at the store, only to find it has been sold. He buys all kinds of millinery, but his wife goes into tantrums when she sees them. He sees the woman with the hat and tries to grab it from her. Her husband, a little sawed-off, interferes, and proves to be "some scrapper," for he leaves Bunnyhug with a black eye and a bruised nose.

Arriving home in a towering rage, Bunnyhug tells Clara, "Now you come out with me and buy a hat that suits you!" Grabbing the handle of the wheel chair, he wheels her through one store after another, scattering people right and left. They buy three hats, but she does not like any of them, and her husband is about to give up in despair when he sees the lady with the hat and her husband, on the brow of a hill ahead of them. He puts on full speed, only to find the couple already at the bottom of the hill. Determined to catch them, he takes the three hats, and deserts the chair—which, having no brakes, starts off by itself.

He runs down the hill, catches up with the couple, and commences to bargain for the hat. The lady finally consents to exchange it for the three Bunnyhug has. Just then they hear a shriek, and Clara, in the wheel-chair, goes past them in a cloud of dust. Recovering from his amazement, Bunnyhug starts after her and finds her, unconscious amidst the debris of the overturned chair, by some miracle, unhurt. When she comes to and sees the hat she is filled with joy, and gives him a strenuous hug.

THE MYSTERY OF THE HIDDEN HOUSE (Special—Two Parts—May 30).—While tramping the hills of Virginia on his vacation, Dick Marston, a young minister, sprains his ankle. Moina Jardine, a demure little mountain maiden, assists him to her grandfather's home, "The Hidden House." Marston learns that Moina is subject to great stress of mind, at times. She tells him she and her sister Robina, take turns caring for Mr. Jardine. Marston falls in love with the beautiful Moina, but Mr. Jardine and Mercy, the colored servant, say, "Wait until you see Robina!" One day, Moina turns from Marston and begs her grandfather to explain the Mystery, but is angrily told to keep silent. That night, Marston, walking in the grounds, meets Moina. She seems dazed, tells him that Robina comes! She disappears, leaving him greatly puzzled. The next morning Robina, beautiful and bewitching, comes dancing in.

Mr. Jardine and Mercy decorate the house and at night, before the blazing logs, the colored servant tells witch stories. Marston, in his room, sees Robina dancing through the grounds in the moonlight. She pouts and goes straight up to his room, laughing at his displeasure. Seeing a picture of Moina, she angrily tears it in pieces and rushes out. Marston is fascinated by Robina and one day, seizing her in his arms, he kisses her passionately. Suddenly her expression changes. She cries out that Moina is coming and falls unconscious. The girl is cared for by Jardine and Mercy, and when Marston next sees her, finds she is once more the sweet and gentle Moina. Appalled at the strange phenomena, he is overcome with emotion. The grandfather explains that Moina is a dual personality, possessed in turn with the soul of Moina and that of Robina, which explains why Marston has never seen the two girls together, but he now knows that Moina and Robina are one and the same. Marston later meets Moina in the garden and tenderly takes her in his arms, telling her of his love. The mystery of "Hidden House" is solved and Robina is only a memory of the past.

THE TREASURE SHIP (Special—Two Parts—May 25).—The "Treasure Ship" is not a real ship, but a model constructed by Captain Bascom during ten years of enforced solitude on a South Sea island after the wreck of the "Golden Cloud." The treasure consists of a bag of gems found under the skeleton of an earlier castaway. When rescue finally comes, Bascom stows the treasure in the hold of his model and so carries it safely to his home, where he has long been mourned as dead. He arrives in time to cheer the last moments of his dying wife, who has been faithful to his memory.

Bascom finds that his daughter, Beth, is now a comely young woman. Tom, her brother, falls under evil influence and commits a theft. His father comes to his aid. Bascom has taken care to conceal all knowledge of his treasure from the children. He decides to bequeath it to Beth and conceives the idea of leaving a chart describing its location with directions couched in misleading, nautical terms, which to his simple mind seem clear and explicit. Shortly afterwards, Bascom passes away. Tom discovers the chart and makes a copy of it. He shows it to Harley, his employer. The man induces Tom to embark for the South Sea, believing the instructions are to be taken literally.

After Tom's departure, however, Harley discovers where the treasure is really hidden. Beth is mystified by the chart bequeathed her by her father, Harley suddenly appears with a note for $100 bearing Bascom's forged signature and demands payment. Beth, being unable to meet the demand, he offers to take the model in exchange. Day, Beth's sweetheart, arrives before the deal can be closed and gives her the money to take up the note. Later, the boy takes the model from the mantlepiece on which it is standing. He accidentally lets it drop. The treasure falls from its hiding place. The secret of the "Treasure Ship" lies revealed.

noon, Rex, known as "The Spider," swaggers into town and robs a saloon. The man escapes, followed by Burns, the new sheriff, and a posse. Williams leaves Anna and Ella in the wagon by the side of a stream while he goes in search of a ford. Rex comes upon the outfit and recognizes Anna as the wife of his foe. Capturing the woman, he binds her and throws her into the wagon. Thrusting Ella aside, the desperado drives off.

The posse arrives just as Williams returns. The husband is frantic because of the mysterious disappearance of his wife and daughter. The men secure the aid of Red Bird, an Indian trailer, and take up the pursuit. They come upon Ella, who tried to follow the wagon. The men learn the story of the "Spider's" villainy.

Discovering that he is being pursued, Rex deserts the wagon, forcing Anna to accompany him. The two crawl up the mountain side until they reach a tiny ledge. Red Bird finds their trail. Brought to bay, Rex uses Anna as a shield while picking off the members of the posse. Three fall victim to his deadly aim. The pursuers resort to strategy. While they attract the "Spider's" attention, Red Bird makes a detour and comes upon the outlaw from behind.

A desperate hand-to-hand combat ensues. The frantic husband and the posse toil towards the ledge. Locked in deadly embrace, Red Bird and the "Spider" reel back and forth. A knife flashes just as a pistol is fired. When Williams and the posse arrive at the spot, Red Bird is breathing his last. Rex, however, has committed his last crime —a bowie knife is buried to the hilt in his heart.

AND THE DANCE WENT ON (May 29).—Jim and Tom purchase tickets to the Trainmen's Ball. They break the news to their sweethearts, Jane and Grace, and then try to arrange to get off on the day of the dance. A marble-hearted official turns down their request. However, at Jane's suggestion, the boys decide to take their go-to-meetin' clothes to work with them on the day of the event, thus doing away with the necessity of returning home to dress.

It happens that old Grouch Brent, the conductor, and Fogeye, the engineer, have a touch of that tired feeling on the all-important day and therefore take things easy. Furthermore, cows insist on ambling along the track, while occasionally Fogeye stops the train to chat with some acquaintance along the road. When the run finally comes to an end, the boys are hours late.

Jane and Grace are inclined to be peevish when Jim and Tom finally appear. The lovers arrive at the dance when the fun is at its height. But once more, luck hands the boys an awful jolt. A wreck on the line causes the railroad officials to send a call-boy to the scene of festivities with instructions to nail the first crew he sees. Of course, he picks out Jim and Tom.

Bidding their sweethearts a tearful goodbye, the unfortunates heed duty's call. Two hours later, Jim and Tom, pausing in the back-breaking task of clearing away the wreckage, express their sympathy for the girls whose fun has been spoiled. Fortunately for their peace of mind, Jim and Tom are unable to see Jane and Grace at that moment. For, deeply absorbed in threading the mazes of the tango with two good-looking chaps, the girls have completely forgotten the existence of their sweethearts.

THE COMING OF LONE WOLF (May 30).—Lone Wolf decides to take a Hopi maid for his squaw. Bearing suitable gifts, the Indian sets out for the Hopi village. Natoma's pity for Crooked Leg, a crippled Hopi, is mistaken by the old man for love. Unknown to Crooked Leg, however, the maiden loves Lightfoot, a warrior of the tribe. Lone Wolf arrives at the village. Displaying the presents he has brought, he offers them to Chief Big Thunder in exchange for a Hopi maid who strikes his fancy. Filled with greed, the chief orders all the girls to appear before Lone Wolf.

Lightfoot and Crooked Leg learn of this with anger. Big Thunder drags Natoma before Lone Wolf, who immediately decides to make her his squaw. Crooked Leg begs Natoma to wed him. Lone Wolf comes upon the man in the midst of his plea. Seizing him by the throat the Indian almost strangles him. Vowing vengeance, the old cripple seizes his rifle and follows Lone Wolf as he leaves the village with Natoma behind him. Lightfoot also arms himself and follows his sweetheart and the man who has purchased her. When in the midst of a thicket, Lightfoot raises his rifle and covers Lone Wolf. Before he can fire, however, a shot rings out. Lone Wolf falls from his horse —dead. Startled, Lightfoot runs to the spot.

Natoma believes her lover to have committed the murder, until he shows her his rifle has not been fired. Crooked Leg, hidden behind a tree, learns that Natoma and Lightfoot love each other. He is about to slay the man, when he realizes that his physical deformities and age would bar him from marrying Natoma. Hobbling up to the scene, Crooked Leg announces his guilt and his determination to pay for the crime. Placing the slain Indian across his horse, Crooked Leg limps towards the Hopi village—and death.

EDISON.

A LADY OF SPIRITS (Sixth of Wood B. Wedd's series—May 25).—When Darby Jenks suggested to Wood B. that he should court the widow Morton, Wood B. was not nearly so enthusiastic as he ordinarily was at the prospect of finding a spouse. There were two principal reasons for his attitude. The Widow Morton was not beautiful. She lived in a Haunted House. To these objections Darby replied that beauty was as the flower that faded, whereas such assets as the widow possessed in the way of houses and land were entirely a different matter. As for ghosts, Darby pooh-poohed the very idea. Urged on by Darby's irresistible logic, Wood B. went to call upon the widow. He found her by no means unwilling to consider another venture in matrimony. In fact, before Wood B. knew where he was, the county clerk was asking the coy Mrs. Morton whether she meant years or decades when she said her age was twenty-four. After the marriage license had been procured, Wood B. could see no use in delaying the wedding, but the widow demurred. She would not marry him until he had met dear old Uncle Jerry.

Now, Uncle Jerry was one of the ghosts who frequented the Haunted House, though Wood B. did not know it. Hence, it might be imagined that Mr. Wood did not feel any too comfortable when the widow showed him the portrait of the man he had come to meet, and informed him that poor Uncle Jerry had been dead for quite a while. The fact that the portrait made extremely unpleasant faces at him upset Wood B. considerably, and his state was not improved by the highly curious things that happened in the house. The climax was reached so far as Wood B. was concerned when Uncle Jerry threw a trunk downstairs at him. Wood B. gave a wild yell and fled. The alert widow caught him in the front yard. Wood B. tore up the marriage license and threw it away, but the pieces formed together again, and try as he would, Wood B. could not get rid of it. As he tore down the road, he met Darby. Mounting on the horse behind his friend, Wood B. informed him that he could not make the horse go too fast or far to please him.

THE MYSTERY OF THE AMSTERDAM DIAMONDS (The Seventh Mystery in the Chronicles of Cleek—May 26).—When Samuel J. Smithers, a detective of the American Customs Service, asked for the assistance of Scotland Yard in solving the mystery of the Amsterdam Diamonds, Superintendent Narkom assigned Cleek to the job. For some time past the American Customs Service had been bothered by diamond smuggling. Suspicion pointed in the strongest possible manner to a jeweller named Rosenstein. But though Rosenstein had been stopped and searched several times upon his arrival in New York, no trace of incriminating evidence had been found upon him. At the time of Smither's visit to Scotland Yard it was suspected that Rosenstein was in possession of a valuable lot of diamonds, lately stolen in Amsterdam.

Cleek promised to accompany Smithers across the ocean in the same boat with Rosenstein. But when the boat sailed, the indignant Smithers was unable to discover Cleek anywhere aboard. For his own peculiar reasons, Cleek had disguised himself as an old Hebrew. He kept his identity a secret from everybody aboard, including the American detective. On the way across the Atlantic, Cleek struck up a friendship with Rosenstein, and visited him in his stateroom several times. On one of these visits, he made a remarkable discovery.

When the ship arrived in New York, Smithers had Rosenstein arrested and searched without result. But when the same ship started on her return voyage to Europe, Smithers was astonished to receive a message from Cleek, whom he, of course, supposed to be in England. The solution of the mystery was quite simple. Rosenstein had concealed the diamonds in a secret compartment in his stateroom. He left them there when he landed in New York, only taking the precaution to engage the same stateroom for his return trip. His plan was to take the diamonds from their hiding place and give them to his wife when she came to see him off. Cleek, who had discovered the secret compartment in Rosenstein's stateroom, detained Mrs. Rosenstein aboard the ship until they reached Fire Island, where, in accordance with Cleek's directions, the revenue officers were waiting for the two smugglers, in a cutter.

LOST—A PAIR OF SHOES (May 27.—Mrs. Martin was keeping a secret from her husband. Without his knowledge, she had saved fifty dollars from the household money, with which she intended to buy him a present. For safe-keeping, she had hidden the money in one of her shoes. As Mr. Martin sat reading in their apartment one evening, there rose suddenly on the evening air a weirdly beautiful song—the wild evening chorus of the cats in the neighborhood. Disturbed from his literary researches, Mr. Martin rose, opened the window and flung the first convenient articles which lay at hand at the offending felines. The articles in question happened to be his wife's shoes. Unfortunately, a certain Mr. Thompson happened to be talking to his washerwoman in the alley, on which Mr. Martin's window looked. Mrs. Martin's shoes struck, not the cats, but Mr. Thompson. Boiling with wrath, Mr. Thompson gave the shoes to the washerwoman and departed.

The next morning Mrs. Martin missed her shoes. Mr. Martin, with a guilty start, crept down to the alley to look for them. While he was gone, the indignant Mr. Thompson called with a policeman. His angry demands were quickly stilled in the face of Mrs. Martin's lamentations at the discovery that he had given her money-laden shoes to a washerwoman. Mr. Martin overheard the conversation on the doorstep, and rushed off to the washerwoman's house. There he learned that the washerwoman had given the shoes to her son, Denis, that morning. Denis, disliking their feminine appearance, gave them to a girl named Maggie, who sold them to a second-hand dealer, and gave Denis a nickel of the profits. After several attempts to evade each other, Mr. and Mrs. Martin arrived at the second-hand dealers at the same moment. Realizing that there was no use in attempting to deceive each other further, they bought the shoes. When the second-hand dealer saw Mrs. Martin take fifty dollars worth of bills from her purchase, he fainted.

THE TWO VANREVELS (Special—2 parts—May 29).—The feud between Tom Vanrevel and Robert Carewe started at the time of the outbreak of the Mexican War, when Vanrevel, in a public speech, bitterly assailed Carewe's views on the situation. There had been hard feeling between the two men ever since Carewe had won a considerable sum of money from Crailey Gray at cards, when Vanrevel had paid the boy's debts, and asked him not to play with Carewe again. The first case, Carewe had set aside as an unwarranted interference in other people's affairs on Vanrevel's part, but Tom's attitude on the war situation was of such a nature that Carewe felt he could not pass it by. When Carewe challenged him to a duel, Vanrevel laughed, and refused to fight. Thereupon the enraged Carewe sent word that he would shoot Tom like a dog if he ever dared to set foot on his property.

When Carewe's daughter, Betty, came home from boarding school, Tom Vanrevel fell deeply in love with her. Through a misunderstanding, Betty confused Crailey Gray and Tom Vanrevel from the beginning. She thought Tom was the weak vacillating Crailey, and Crailey, her father's enemy, Vanrevel. And so, when Vanrevel came into the grounds at night, and played on a guitar, Betty did not realize that he was in imminent danger of his life. She only knew that she liked the young man very much indeed, and that she was very glad he liked her well enough to serenade her. When Betty learned that Vanrevel and Crailey Gray were both going to the Mexican War, she sent a note to the man she loved, asking him to come to the Carewe's garden that afternoon. Since it was addressed to him, Crailey Gray got the note. As we have said before, Crailey was a weakling. Tom had been the only strengthening influence in his life. But weakling or not, Crailey rose to his opportunity like a man. He knew that Tom would go if he got Betty's note, and he knew that Carewe would almost certainly kill him. So Crailey put on Vanrevel's uniform, and went in his friend's place.

Carewe, who had learned of his daughter's note, knew that Vanrevel was expected. When Crailey appeared in Tom's uniform, Carewe, true to his promise, shot him. Tom Vanrevel arrived too late to save his friend. Crailey confessed that he had allowed Betty to think he was the other, in the hope that she might learn to love him. Then, begging them to think a little kindly of him, he smiled, and died.

GEORGE KLEINE.

TRAPPED BY WIRELESS (Eclipse—Special—Two Parts—June 2).—William Norwood and his daughter, Betty, are cruising in the Mediterranean on Norwood's pleasure yacht, the "Enid," and the girl, who is a daring sportswoman and crack shot, finally persuades her father to permit her to go ashore for a day's shooting among the rocks. Stavros, leader of a band of outlaws, sees the girl and is smitten with her charms. He refuses to listen to the advice of his followers that he seize and hold her for ransom. They protest so loudly against allowing the yacht to proceed on its way unmolested that Stavros consents to attack it, stipulating, however, that no harm or insult be offered to the girl.

Once aboard the yacht, however, the bandits mutiny and Stavros and Betty are bound and held prisoners while the outlaws celebrate the capture. Stavros, bound as he is, manages to crawl to the wireless operator's room and, coached by Betty, sends a wireless call for help. Then, after they have succeeded in loosening the ropes with which they are bound, the two swim ashore. Pursued by their foes they are besieged in a mountain cave, where Stavros holds his own until his last cartridge has been fired. Just as the bandits, aware of their enemy's lack of further ammunition, are about to make a final attack, a steam launch, loaded with marines, appears off shore. Stavros seizes an axe and rushes toward the attacking party. He succeeds in keeping them away from the cave until the hurrying aid arrives, but his success costs him his life. Betty is saved, and the bandits, "trapped by wireless," are easily dispersed by the brave marines.

THE CLOCK WENT WRONG (May 26).—A young man who has been reproved for not reaching the office at the opening of business in the morning concludes that his watch, and not he, is in the wrong. He returns home one evening, and, after having told his wife to have the jeweler call and regulate the alarm clock, and finding a strange man there with a bunch of clocks, about to depart, gives him his watch also to repair. It happens that the departing member is a sneak-thief who has been making a collection of clocks in that block, and he is naturally delighted to have a watch added to lighten his burden, in contrast to his heavy load.

The wife soon returns with the jeweler, explanations follow, and the police are called. In the interim, the crook has met the young husband's employer, and by offering a bargain induced him to buy the watch. As the police approach the scene, the crooks makes a get-away, leaving the clocks on the sidewalk. The police then rush in and arrest the buyer of the watch, charging him with stealing the clocks. He is identified by the young husband and released. The next morning he rises early and is determined to be on time. He rushes to the office, and, to his dismay, finds that he is the first to arrive, as the clock registers just 7:30 a.m.

SIMP SIMPSON AND THE SPIRITS (May 26).—Cowboy Simpson is not much on looks, but is some shooter and handy fighter, and never sidesteps trouble. Prof. Mahatma, Oriental mystic, opens up a dirty curtained shop of occult power in Rattlesnake Gulch. "Simp" being very curious about himself, learns for the price of $25 that he has wonderful occult issue. He falls into a mumbling mood, and everybody around town takes advantage of his hypnotic state by playing tricks upon him, but when at the end of the seventh day he again discovers himself, everybody scatters as they fear that he will use his gun, which he has recovered with his normal senses.

DAWN (May 27).—An aged hermit finds a baby on a mountain trail, and as there is no clue to her identity, he calls her Dawn. She grows into a beautiful woman, and loves Dave, the forest ranger. Then comes an artist from the city, who falls in love with this rustic beauty, and Dave shows so much temper that she transfers her affection. The artist's father, a chronic invalid, has suffered for years from loss of memory caused by a fall from a cliff while traveling in the mountains with his little daughter. When the artist returns to the city he takes a sketch of the cliff, and it so impresses the fugitive fancy of the old man that he recovers his mind, and the artist eventually discovers that the country girl is his own sister.

The self-sacrificing hermit concludes that Dawn should be returned to her people, who are affluent, but she is loyal to him, and his last days are made happy by her refusal to desert him. One night she meets Dave at the old trysting place, and their vows are renewed. In the final scene they enter the cabin to discover that the hermit has passed into the shadows, reading his book of evening psalms. Then and there they pledge their faithfulness through all the future that awaits them.

THE GIRL BEHIND THE BARRIER (May 30).—The cruelty of her foster parents drives Madge from the hills of her childhood and eventually, in desperation, she faces starvation alone in a great city. She has a certain natural cleverness for taking care of herself, but the toilsome way of life is very hard. She finally falls in with clever people who have mysterious money and their way seems easy. The officers of the Secret Service Department of the United States Government, however, who are always looking up mysterious money, discover that the chief "shover" in the new issue is a beautiful girl, whose simplicity is evidently preyed upon by the men higher up. The scenes show how bogus money ("greengoods") is made and distributed, not omitting the dangers that eventually befall everyone connected with such nefarious enterprise, for the sleuths of the United States Government never let up when once started in pursuit of the offender.

Madge has married Tom, seemingly an ignoble member of submerged society, and is innocently working to forward the interests that she believes are honest. When the final raid is made, poor Madge, heartbroken, appears at the station, when she sees Tom and tells him that she had come to save him, but was sorry she was too late. Then it develops that Tom was the leading factor in the Secret Service Department, and has brought about the capture and conviction of one of the most daring band of counterfeiters that ever existed, and Madge has unconsciously helped the Secret Service to a culmination of their plan.

SECOND CHILDHOOD (May 29).—Peter and David, friends from childhood, now in their old age, have again returned in fancy to childhood days. They discuss the old tricks they played when boys, and decide to renew their familiarity with a natural art of bad boyishness. They wrap a brick in a piece of paper, place it in the road, and laugh heartily at the minister who picks it up. They then take up the fragrant trick of disinterring a deceased cat. While Peter is so engaged, David decided to play a trick on him. He leaves his hat by the roadside, further on drops his coat and a club smeared with blood, and a little further drops his vest in the bushes and leaves. Then he tears up the ground as if a great struggle had taken place, and showed signals of a body being dragged toward the river.

Peter finds these tragic sights, and as an ugly tramp is seen coming out of the bushes near by, he thinks the tramp has murdered David and gives the alarm. Everybody joins in the hunt for the remains of the unfortunate David, and the tramp, who is supposed to have committed the crime, is locked up. The sheriff is all stirred up and has a posse diving into the river to try and recover the remains of the ancient David. Finally that worthy turns up and declares with a great hee-haw that he has not played a trick like that since he was a boy.

THE BABY SPY (Special—2 parts—May 25).—Jim Sherman, a Northerner, living in the South, joins the Federal forces. His heroic wife, Jane, and his baby daughter, Lillian, bid him a sad farewell. The Federal recruits are quartered some miles down the river, and there come tidings to the new soldier from his wife and little daughter, and he returns them a letter, which they open feverishly for news. He encloses a little letter for the baby, and she is delighted. Immediately she laboriously starts out to send a letter to her father in reply. Just about this time a lot of Confederate officers, who are making a daring reconnaissance toward the Federal lines, drive into the yard of the Sherman home and take possession of the house. The mother is very much frightened at this invasion, but the officers are gentlemen, and are soon made at home. Lillian quickly makes friends with the men.

The business of the officers, however, is urgent, and they soon dismiss the family from the room, get out a war map and as Lillian has returned and is playing on the floor with her doll she is allowed to remain in the room. They set her down from the table, where they have been showing her the map, and while she is apparently innocently playing with her doll, she is all ears, listening to their plans for the capture of the Federal camp, where her father is stationed. This plan is embraced in a message that Col. Mooney places in his hat. Lillian purposely breaks the head of her favorite doll; then shows it tearfully to Col. Sayles, who tells her to take it to her mother to be mended. She exits in presumable great grief. Once out of the room, she rushes joyously to her mother and explains to her what she has heard. The mother realizes the importance of the message, and when she invites the officers to lunch, instructs Lillian to get the note if possible, and make a copy of it. The child follows instructions, replaces the original in the hat that has been left in the front room, and afterwards gives her mother the copy. While the men are still at the table, Jane, the mother, rushes to the stables, secures a mount and quietly rides toward the Yankee lines.

As the officers are weary from the hard riding, and wish to give the horses a rest, they take long leisure at the luncheon, but after a while time presses and they go back to the front room. Maj. Mooney, examining his hat and finding his message still there, is unsuspicious and sends the orderly to the stable to get their mounts ready. Meantime, little Lillian uses her wiles with such charm that the officers are loath to leave such pleasant company and resume their hard ride. When the orderly returns from the stable and reports "one horse shy," there is instant commotion. Until now the lady of the house has not been missed. There is a grand rush to the stable and the old negro hostler is threatened with death if he does not tell them who has taken the horse. He stolidly refuses to give the information, and they return to the house, questioning the child and threatening to cut off her ears unless she tells them where her mother is, but she simply laughs in the faces of the officers. They see questions are useless and as time is passing, decide at once to ride forward.

In the meantime, Jane is speeding toward the Yankee camp with the information safe in the sole of her shoe. Eventually she comes to a bridge, where she sees a picket-post that will make her passage impossible. She deserts her horse and, running a distance through the woods, swims the stream a distance above the bridge. She reaches the Yankee camp and is led to headquarters with her news. Instantly there is a commotion in response. The entire camp is up in arms. Jim meets his wife, and is ordered to take personal charge of her.

The Union soldiers take the bridge where the picket-post which blocked Jane's path is stationed and quietly advance on the general body, and the Confederates, instead of surprising them as originally planned, are themselves surprised and overcome. The Federal charge is quick and decisive. The Confederates retreat in disorder. The Colonel in command, out of gratitude for the valuable service of Jim's brave wife, gives him a three months' furlough to visit his home, where the Confederate camp was frustrated by the cunning of baby Lillian.

THE ADVENTURES OF KATHLYN, No. 12 (The King's Will) (Special—Two Parts—June 1).—Fast following the death of the King of Allaha, Prince Umballah, dethroned by the revolution, manages to reinstate himself and orders Kathlyn and her father brought to the palace in order that one of them may be made the reigning sovereign. Two parchments conferring heirship to the throne to Colonel Hare and his family are now in the hands of the Supreme Tribunal, one of which has been proved a forgery. This has been cancelled by the late King, and consequently the genuine parchment is still in force. The throne is offered to Colonel Hare, but he emphatically refuses to accept and is arrested. Thereupon, the unwelcome honor is proffered to Kathlyn as next in succession. She, seeing a way to release her father, and revenge herself and family upon Umballah, instantly accepts and is crowned Queen. The first thing she does upon ascending the throne is to order the release of her father.

A girl of the Harem, who witnessed the murder of the King through the treachery of Umballah, appears and tells her story. Thereupon, Kathlyn and the Supreme Tribunal order the arrest of Umballah. He is ignominiously stripped of his rank and is sentenced to serve for life upon the prison treadmill. The High Priest has discovered the will of the King, which is brought to the throneroom and read. It bequeaths a vast fortune in gold sovereigns buried on Volcano Island to Kathlyn. She prefers her liberty rather than the empty honors of Allaha, and offers to get and give the gold, distribute it to the poor if the Supreme Tribunal will release her and her family from heirship to the throne. This they agree to do. A crafty creature of Umballah manages to inform him of these doings, and in turn gets in touch with a faithful slave, who, by generous bribery of the guards, soon accomplishes Umballah's escape. The latter, securing his liberty, deftly and quickly disguises himself in the garb of a holy-man, and preys upon the credulity of the simple sea-side folk, so that he gets their services and a boat, and makes an hurried trip to Volcano Island. The day following, Kathlyn, Bruce, her father, Ramabai and Pundits, secure swift mounts and ride toward the sea, proposing to voyage to the treasure trove. The ever crafty Umballah, knowing of their route and intentions, treacherously weakens the cables of the swinging bridge over a deep chasm, assured that they will be precipitated into lickings. A wandering lion, however, ventures upon the bridge, before they do, goes through and shows the flimsy character of its construction, and the evil sign of Umballah's mischief.

Bruce, at once busy and undeterred, soon has the bridge repaired; they resume their mounts and go forward toward the seashore. Kathlyn, ever on the alert, saves the life of her chief boatman's child, by picking up the infant as a leopard is about to attack it, and killing the hungry beast by a single, well-directed shot from her revolver. Bruce also has the good fortune to save the life of the boatman himself, who has stumbled into a leopard trap. The gratitude of the man is so great that he offers Kathlyn's party all the boats at his disposal to help them make the voyage to Volcano Island.

The scene shifts to this desolate but adventurous spot, showing Umballah and his followers locating the cave where the treasure is concealed. Subsequently, when the bags of gold are brought to light, the leader of the sailors asks at once for a division of it. Umballah quells this mutiny in swift and decisive fashion by plunging a knife into the malcontent and leaves him for dead as they, by his

Great Pictures From a Great Story

The dance hall scene in the Alaskan frontier town—Helen Chester's escape from the small-pox ship—the wanton murder in the streets of Nome—the seizure of the mines by the powerful political boss, backed by a corrupted judge—the organization of the "Vigilantes"—the blowing up of the mines—the gambling hall scene where Glenister stakes his half of the Midas on the turn of a card—the awful night spent by Helen Chester in the deserted roadhouse, alone with the passion-crazed Struve—the race with Fate through a terrific storm by Glenister and the Broncho Kid—the fight with bare hands between Glenister and McNamara—and the final betrothal of Glenister and Helen on the shore of the northern sea as the sun goes down in the west—these are a few of the scenes that gripped capacity audiences at the mammoth Strand Theatre, New York, and at Chicago's class theatre, The Studebaker, where The Spoilers is now playing.

"I Broke Him With My Naked Hands"

The bare-handed fight of two hate-maddened men, both physical giants, alone in a small frame building in Nome—a fight that raged for almost an hour up and down the length of the lawyer's cheap office, that demolished book cases and chairs, that tore the shirts of both men to shreds, and that finally ended in Glenister's getting the hammerlock grip that broke McNamara's arm at the shoulder — is only one of a dozen great scenes that picture REX BEACH'S wonderful novel, THE SPOILERS, that fascinating story of the Alaskan North as it was in the early days soon after gold was discovered. The fight between Glenister and McNamara is alone enough to make this picture famous. It is a real fight—no make-believe. Great audiences sit almost without breathing as they see it portrayed.

"The Cases Are Wrong!" Cried Cherry

Balked at every turn, despairing of winning the heart of Helen whom

McNamara also courted, worn out by nights of watching and days of frantic endeavor, Glenister was both crazed and dazed. Persuaded by Cherry Malotte not to seek solace in drink, he turned to the gambling tables of the Broncho Kid. Luck followed him till late in the night, then suddenly turned. In a final desperate play, he staked his entire interest in the "Midas" against the Broncho Kid's faro bank. Cherry Malotte "kept the cases". Undetected by the excited onlookers, the Broncho Kid manipulated the cards and Glenister lost. But Cherry Malotte had caught the quick movement of the Broncho Kid's fingers. "The cases are wrong", she cried. "That bet is off." Such vivid reality, such graphic portrayal of the primal passions of men, has perhaps never before been seen on the "silent stage" as thousands are now witnessing daily in New York, Chicago and other cities, where "The Spoilers" is now being shown.

Then there is a tremendous hush—the earth trembles, the slumbering volcano belches forth fire, lava and rock, which compels Kathlyn and her party to run to shelter under an overhanging cliff, while tons of hot lava fall all about them as they crouch in the shadow of the rock, beyond harm's fiery way. BIOGRAPH.

THE FATHER'S SCAPEGOAT (May 18).—Caught in a trap, the father, believing he would be able to readjust the wrong, blamed his scapegoat son for a crime he himself had committed. It resulted in spurring the son on into a successful life. With it came the return of his good name.

THE ROAD TO PLAINDALE (May 23).—Having but two months to live, the elder brother shouldered the other's crime. The rough life of the prison air and hard labor brought health and the desire for freedom. His escape made good, he came face to face with his former sweetheart. Through her efforts he was reinstated in society.

ROMEO AND JULIET (May 21).—Mike Montague and Pete Capulet, how they fought at the quarry. Romeo and Juliet came to the rescue and rode off from the scene of the feud on Romeo's rag wagon. "The hated Montague," roared the Capulets. Believe me, there was some feud.

PERCY, THE LADY-KILLER (May 21).—Tired of office grind, Percy obtained the lead with a motion picture company, playing "The Wife Beater"—beauty, not experience, necessary. If Percy had been possessed of a little of the latter, this picture would never have been. Gallantry is a great thing, but Percy carried the thing too far.

THE SCIENCE OF CRIME (Two Parts—May 28).—Young Blackwell, a genius in criminology, is attacked by crooks while studying his profession at close range. He falls into the hands of the gangster who had been "sent up" years before on his father's arguments. It is the gangster's chance for vengeance. As a result the elder Blackwell awakens to the fact that he is convicting his own son, as a criminal, on the same arguments he had used against the gangster.

A DARING GETAWAY (May 30).—The thing we most fear ofttimes comes upon us and so the chauffeur, fearing the automobile thieves who were rumored to be abroad, became their victim. He had with him funds for the branch bank in the next village. These he had agreed under protest to deliver for his employer, the bank president. The cashier of the bank on a "joy ride" came thrillingly to the rescue. Thus he made good for his thoughtlessness.

THE PRICE OF THE DRINKS (May 25).—The army was the goat while "Cap" and the lieutenant went off sporting. That made the army sore, so he went on strike and followed "cap" and the lieutenant to town. They were certainly "buffaloing" the German saloon keeper, palming off before his near-sighted eyes a dummy as their million-dollar friend. But when they left and the German demanded the price of the drinks, there was little left of the dummy. "I am a murderer," yelled the German. The army, looking in at the window, took advantage of this great war and "Cap" and the lieutenant were led off to the sheriff.

WIDOW MUGGINS'S WEDDING (May 25).—When Griggs learned that the widow Muggins had been left a fortune, he was Johnny-on-the-spot, but Tibbs steadied his nerves with good old rye. That settled him with the widow. The day of the wedding a fire broke out. Everybody left but the bride. Where was the groom? Never mind. Tibbs to the rescue and the widow Muggins's name was Tibbs. Poor Griggs.

LUBIN.

THE PARTICULAR COWBOYS (May 26).—There is trouble on Square S ranch. The cook quits, and Jake, the chief cowboy, is sent to town for another. He brings a pretty little woman named Muriel. There is a riot at dinner when they cannot carve the meat with an axe. Jake claims Muriel is wronged and swears to avenge her. He gets one of her dresses and a sunbonnet and serves supper himself. The first man that complains is grabbed and given a severe thrashing. When the biscuits are served the boys slyly pocket them and steal away to dispose of them in the chicken yard. They come upon Jake and Muriel locked in each other's arms. They grab Jake and before they can make up their mind whether to kill or tar and feather him, the boss drives up with a chinaman to do the cooking. The boys are all satisfied and it all ends gloriously.

FOR TWO PINS (May 26).—John Dunn is forgetful. One morning, while dressing in a hurry, his wife knocks at the door, just as he is putting his diamond horseshoe pin in his tie. He lays the pin down, opens the door, then hustles into his coat and rushes out, forgetting the pin. Running along the street he pumps into a drunk, who struggles with him. John breaks away and dashes off. Later, he misses his pin and thinks the drunk has robbed him. He runs back, finds the man, sees a horseshoe pin in his tie, tears out the pin and dashes away. The drunk yells for help; the guardians of the law answer his call and take up the chase. John is overtaken, but refuses to be arrested; he takes a gun away from one of the policemen and chases the whole crowd. Reserves are called out and put on his trail. After a strenuous run John starts back home, closely followed by the police. Dashing into the house he finds his wife wearing his pin, which she found lying on the dresser. Realizing that he has robbed the drunk, John appeals to wifey to help him. She slips out, finds the man on the front steps, sticks the pin in the back of his coat and runs back into the house. The police break in and accuse John of stealing the pin. He denies all knowledge of it. The drunk is brought into the house. The pin is found on his back and he is unable to explain. Thinking someone has been trying to kid him, the chief has the intoxicated man dragged out and tossed in the creek. John promises his wife a new hat for her cleverness.

THE TRUNK MYSTERY (Special—Two Parts—May 27).—Dunn Brown's "nights out" have brought worry to his family. Among his visitors is one Smith, a suitor for the hand of his sister, Gwendolyn, and between them theye has sprung up a dislike, owing to the claims of Smith that the professional detectives never discover anything, while if he had the opportunity he could sleuth out the most mysterious crime. Brown is at his club, "under the weather," while his family is packing to leave for the country, and Smith is sent to look for him. He arrives at the club and induces Brown to go home. Being unable to find his overcoat, Brown is furnished with a very gaudy one, belonging to a member of the club.

On his way home he encounters a tramp about to be arrested and releases him from the officer, promising to provide him with a bed and breakfast. This scene occurs at a coal yard, which the police are clearing of tramps, and his flashy overcoat becomes much soiled. Arriving home with his new friend, he is refused admission to his bedroom by his wife, so he goes to sleep on the floor of the parlor.

In the early morning he awakens with no memory of the events of the night before, and notes with alarm the sleeping tramp on the floor, whom he finds it impossible to wake up. The morning paper arrives, telling of a murder in a coal yard, the suspected murderer being some individual in a flashly plaid overcoat. In his disordered mind he pictures himself as the murderer, and the tramp on the floor as the victim, for here is a flashy overcoat as evidence. Seeing that he must act quickly, he takes from the largest truck the apparel with which it has been packed and hurries the sleeping tramp into it. He is discovered by Susan, the maid, whom he bribes to keep his secret. By this time Smith arrives to bid his fiancee farewell. He, too, reads of the coal yard murder and nominates himself as the detective to hunt it out. During breakfast the tramp awakens, creeps out of the trunk, hurries into the street and is arrested. Finding the empty trunk opened, the family hurries the apparel back into it, and when the baggagemen arrive it is sent with the other baggage, and Brown in terror keeps his eye upon it from the taxicab behind. The club member arrives in search of his overcoat. Smith, who has already seen the overcoat, and suspected Brown of the crime, turns his suspicions upon the club member, whom he arrests. The inspector detains the club member, and Smith sets out in pursuit of other evidence. He encounters Susan, puts her under a third degree, gets from her what she knows about the trunk affair, and starts off in pursuit of Brown, after placing Susan, too, in jail. Meanwhile, the Browns have started for the country, where Brown has many adventures in attempting to conceal the trunk. In these adventures he is pursued by the indefatigable Smith, who finally arrests him and takes him and the trunk to the police station in the city. Here it is discovered that there has not been any murder at all, that the account was a hoax, perpetrated by an enterprising club reporter. Smith's prisoners are released; he is thrashed by the club member for his unwarranted arrest.

THE CROWNING GLORY (Special—Two Parts—May 28).—Abel Ormison is a bankrupt. To stave off a crisis he borrows money from Jason Sharrock, a wealthy neighbor. The day the note falls due his creditor is injured in an automobile collision. Jason's death, the old man hastens to have the note renewed. He is told that Jason will live only as a cripple, and is too ill to be interviewed. He steals the note from Jason's desk, and falls into the power of Ezra Wilton, the butler, who has witnessed the theft. Wilton is a rogue. He persuades Ormison to use his daughter as a bait to lure Jason to ruin. Ormison signs an agreement to force Joy to divide the property at Jason's death. Knowing nothing of the conspiracy, the girl becomes Jason's secretary, and, later, his wife.

After the honeymoon, the butler induces Jim Grogan, a crook, to put Jason out of the way. Grogan demands payment in advance. Wilton hands over the money, but accidently drops the agreement upon the floor. Jason is attacked, but is saved by Joy, after a struggle. Grogan escapes. Joy finds the incriminating paper, and learns that she has been a tool in the hands of bad men. Her bewilderment arouses Jason's suspicion. He secretly reads the agreement. Keeping the discourse to himself, he parts coldly from his wife and goes to a hospital to be operated upon. The operation relieves him of his deformity. He returns home, pretending that he is still a cripple. Joy has gone out. Finding evidence that Wilton is at the bottom of the mystery, Jason finally confronts the butler and Ormison in the act of looting the desk for a getaway. Astounded at his recovery to health, the pair are at his mercy. Jason kicks them out of the house. His hope for a happy future lies in Joy's innocence. He decides to test her. Hearing her footsteps, he drops into his invalid chair. He tells Joy that he has lost his fortune, and that she is no mate for a poverty-stricken cripple. Joy leaves him, as he had anticipated. But she returns. In her hands are her jewels, and the deed for the house he had given her. Jason looks into her eyes—and comprehends. Then they had to begin the honeymoon all over again.

THE TEST OF COURAGE (May 29).—Manuel Lopes is the head of a Mexican colony on an American ranch. Anita, Manuel's daughter, and Ramon Suarez, a young laborer, are sweethearts. Manuel is not favorable to the match. He is especially angered one day when Ramon is not able to turn over to the tyrant the weekly tribute. Ed. Wright, the young manager of the ranch, admires Anita. Manuel notes Ed.'s infatuation, and proposes that Ed. marry Anita, but she revolts. Manuel, determined not to be disobeyed, locks Anita in his shack, while he goes for the village priest. Anita breaks out of the shack, goes to inform Ramon of the impending catastrophe and the two determine to run away and be married.

On their way to the church Anita and Ramon run into Manuel, who is returning with the priest. Manuel takes Ramon a prisoner to the fields, where the Mexican colony is working. Manuel has determined to prepare a terrible punishment for his prisoner. He is to be slowly buried alive. The tyrant orders his Mexican subjects to dig the hole and they, not daring to run counter to Manuel's methods, obey. Anita and the priest see these preparations and recognize the terrible scheme. Terrified, Anita runs to the ranch office and begs Ed. to save her lover's life. In addition to Anita's pleading the priest silently holds up a small cross before Ed.'s eyes. He takes his revolver belt and leaves with the girl and priest.

Meanwhile, Ramon, securely bound, has been lowered into the hole in the field, and the Mexicans, under Manuel's orders, are gradually filling up the hole. Ed. arrives and orders Manuel to release Ramon. The Mexican laughs insolently and draws his knife before Ed. can get his revolver into play. The Mexican dismisses Ed. and threatens to kill him unless he keeps his promise to marry Anita. The girl jumps into the hole, determined to die with Ramon. Ed. determines upon a desperate chance to test Manuel's courage. He tears open the front of his shirt, holds it back from his bare chest and dares the Mexican to strike. Manuel starts to strike, but checks himself. Ed.'s haunted, desperate look comes into his eyes; he can no longer meet Ed.'s gaze. Anita and the other Mexicans, noting their chief's plight, crowd about. Anita calls Manuel a coward, and snatches the knife away from him. The Mexicans, realizing that the tyrant's will is broken, begin to jeer him. Manuel, thoroughly cowed, turns and runs. Ramon is saved and Manuel's tyranny forever ended.

CIRCUS TIME IN TOYLAND (May 30).—Tommy's dream of the circus put a great idea into his head. His toy attic was well stocked with a Noah's Ark, many mechanical acrobats and animals, and he conceived the idea of training the toys to really perform a circus. His perseverance brought about wonderful results. First he evolved a wonderful parade. Band wagon, drawn by eight white horses, which behaved extremely well. The animal wagons were admirably constructed, but the lions and tigers insisted on breaking loose and gave much trouble to the keepers, who, however, being strong men, always managed to catch them by the tails and swing them back into their cages. The giraffe was a very unmanageable animal; he would push the clown off his back and turn round and laugh at him. Many other troubles occurred, but really the parade was a success. Later Tommy trained his toys to do inside canvass work. The clowns and acrobatics were wonderfully clever, and it really was strange that toys could be so well trained. One of the big features was the races, two teams of four horses each contested for honors and even the losers were entitled to applause.

A TANGO TRAGEDY (May 30).—Pat Muldoon is much opposed to the tango and when he falls asleep with his feet in the oven waiting for Nora, his daughter, to come home, and his socks catch fire, he starts for the ballroom and announces to Dick Kelly, her sweetheart, that he will kill the cuss that coaxes his daughter to dance. In spite of that Dick comes a few days later to invite Nora to a dance.

Pat, coming home early, finds him and sends a charge of shot after him. Dick meets Bill Ryan and they frame up a scheme. Pat is induced to shoot at a dummy, supposing it to be Dick, and he is horror stricken. That evening Jack dresses as a ghost and appears before Pat, commanding him to follow. He leads him to the dance hall and compels him to learn to dance. Pat wants to rebel, but all the dancers have been warned by Bill and they all declare that they cannot see Dick, so Pat knows it is a ghost and he must do as he is told. The widow makes a good dancing teacher and presently Pat finds it is good fun. He is rather proud when the others congratulate him on his proficiency, but when he runs into Dick, now dressed in his regular clothes and with the white off his face, he suspects a trick and wants to fight. Bill has the music start up and the widow asks Pat to dance. It is either fight or tango. Pat elects to tango and Dick dances off with Nora.

COL. HEEZA LIAR—FARMER (May 18).—The current cartoon comedy shows that the famous Col. Heeza Liar has heard the "Back to Nature" call. He becomes a farmer and directs his genius toward making the farmer's life a truly simple one. In this, as in all other directions, he is successful. His first achievement is to train his bantam rooster to call him at dawn. Even the birds are taught to serve as an orchestra while Heeza eats his breakfast.

The routine work of a farmer is play to Heeza for he has taught Fido, the Liar hound, to dig potatoes. Bill, the rooster, commander-in-chief of the barnyard, marshals the hens in a military array. Three flaps of Bill's wings and the scratching hens begin to till the ground. Rose, the Holstein cow, has also succumbed to Heeza's teaching and each evening calls at the kitchen door as much as to say, "Bring on your pail, I'll fill it."

And even when Max gets to his room and releases his spouse their troubles are not over. Uncle Paul raps at the door for admission. Max hides his wife in the chimney. It was a narrow escape. Mrs. Max looks like a dusky belle, she is so covered with soot. They hurry to the bathroom to remove the dirt. Enter Uncle Paul. There is no hope and Max confesses all. But Uncle Paul is a regular fellow, and forgiving his nephew and niece, gives them his blessing and a belated wedding present.

patra and Mark Antony has stirred students of history and human nature in every generation since the famous drama and its origin. Mark Antony's triumphing over the fleeing assassins of Julius Caesar, at Phillipi, made him the greatest man in all the world. It remained for Cleopatra, Queen of Egypt, to end his glorious career. Heedless of the inevitable consequence, Cleopatra had abandoned herself to the luxurious extravagances and riotous living of the times.

The advent of Mark Antony threatened her ease and happiness. Consequently, she set about to save her crown by practicing her seductive charms upon the victorious Antony. The hitherto invulnerable warrior was immediately enslaved. Dreams of power and ambition were ruthlessly disregarded to make room for his new and overwhelming love for the Egyptian sorceress. Mark Antony for the first time found something that rivalled in his affections his wonderful devotion to his country. Octavius Caesar, realizing the situation, sought to save Mark Antony from himself, but Mark Antony was not the man to listen to suggestions. Consequently, Octavius determined to vent his wrath upon Antony for deserting the Roman cause, excited the people against their former idol, and in a short while an army was ready to avenge Rome even against their once beloved Mark Antony.

So busy and so happy in his love-making was Mark Antony in the palace of Tarsus that the possibility of a plot against him never entered his mind, until he was called upon to defend himself. He fought with all his old time valor, but he was fighting Romans now and soon the tide of battle turned against him. A messenger hurried with the news to Cleopatra. Cleopatra read the evil tidings and immediately ordered the messenger poisoned. Embittered by his disgrace, Mark Antony made his last effort to prove his love for Cleopatra. He returned to the palace of Tarsus and ended his life by his own hand at the feet of his charmer. Unwilling to survive the triumph of Octavius, Cleopatra bares her breast to the deadly sting of a serpent.

THE CONQUEST OF CLAIRE (Special—Two Parts—May 23).—Claire Van Arsdale, unusually pretty and exceedingly vivacious, is the pride of her father, a wealthy but simple living florist.

Through a trivial argument Claire's father and his neighbor William Davidson quarrel and vow to hate each other always. This will never do as Claire and young Fred Davidson have vowed to love each other always. Their respective parents entreat Claire and Fred to see no more of each other. The lovers promise, but are not sincere in their oaths. Claire's mischievous disposition is the bane of her servants' existence and particularly is the governess the object of her hoydenish pranks. The limit is reached when Claire, disguised as a man, breaks into the room of the spinster teacher. The governess screams so loudly that the household is aroused, including Mr. Van Arsdale. He informs Claire that she must go to a boarding school. There is no recourse from her father's verdict, so a few day's time finds Claire at school. Here she invents new pranks and although preferring her home, she manages to keep herself interested without absorbing too much education.

However, Claire is overjoyed when the summer holidays enable her to go home. On the journey homeward she gets an idea and arriving at the gate, she puts her plan into execution. She affects the air of the "Grand Lady" to the astonishment and annoyance of her father and his household. Claire informs the simple living folks that they must not appear for dinner in other than evening clothes. They comply and although it seems strange to them, they eat with gloved hands because Claire declares it good form.

Her affected air soon has the desired effect for "Daddy" Van Arsdale begins bemoaning the day he sent her to the boarding school. Claire, however, is her unaffected and charming self with Fred, her lover. They have many surreptitious meetings and are seeking a way to re-unite their parents when Fate steps in. Claire, trying to capture a fallow deer that has escaped, runs unto the estate of her neighbor, Davidson. Fred is enjoying a hunt when the doe comes in sight. Fred fires and Claire tumbles to the ground with a bullet in her shoulder. She is carried to the house of the Davidson's. Her father and a physician are summoned. The physician pronounces Claire's condition not serious. Claire declares the injury trivial compared to its result as she sees her father and Fred's father friends again and feels Fred's arm about her.

RASTUS' RIOTOUS RIDE (May 25).—Rastus was an old man now, and he was having a holiday. The cause of the holiday was the wedding of his only daughter, Sadie, to the man of her choice. It was a big social event in Coonville. Rastus, of course, was to be the guest of honor, but even so he was not quite welcome unless he brought along a bird for a wedding gift. Sadie as much as told him so. Rastus determined to get a bird. But where? While he ponders the question, the "gobble, gobble" of a nearby turkey solves his dilemma. The practice at coop-robbing secured in his younger days stands him in good stead now. The turkey is a big fellow, but Rastus gets him. Donning his stove pipe, he sets out for the scene of the ceremony.

He is broke and this condition probably accounts for the ease with which he was beguiled into substituting for a convict. Certain it is that he ran afoul of the law, represented by a sheriff and a posse. When explanations were found unavailing, Rastus sought safety in flight. Hard pressed, he rushes into the village post office. He offers himself and his turkey as subjects for parcel post delivery to Harmony Hall, where the wedding is to take place. The postmaster has accepted and stamped the consignment on the bald head when the posse enters. "Hands off the Mail" orders the postmaster. He shows the sheriff the law and the sheriff owns himself defeated.

The postmaster hangs Rastus and his bird on the railway mail-snatcher. A few minutes later the mail train had the peculiar couple on board and in half an hour Rastus and his bird are delivered to Sadie. The turkey still lives, but not for long. He is turned over to the bridegroom's brother, Peter, a Pullman chef, who has him roasting in a moment or two.

MAKING STEEL RAILS (May 26).—The iron industry, one of the world's biggest industrials, representing millions of dollars in capital and giving employment to hundreds of thousands of workers, is interestingly portrayed in a series of most instructive pictures. The crushed ore brought to the gigantic furnaces is quickly reduced to a molten state and then by the various processes, puddling, etc., the slag and other refuse is eliminated. Carried in giant collectors to the chutes or canal-like sluices that lead to the molds, the partially finished product takes the shape commercially known as "pig-iron." These bars or "pigs" are next transferred to the "Bessemer" converters, where, by that now world-known process, an excellent quality of steel is produced, which is then cast into "ingots." These block-like forms are then reheated preparatory to their being passed between the rollers, which quickly convert them into the most essential product of railroad equipment, the rail.

THE CITY OF AGRA (INDIA) (May 26).—Agra, in the province of Bengal, India, has, in its old fort, and the "Faj-Mahal," the most wonderful examples of ancient architecture and Eastern art. The Faj-Mahal, built by the Emporer Shoh Djihan, is built entirely of white marble and is one of the most beautiful sights in the world.

THE WAR OF THE LILLIPUTIANS (Special—Two Parts—May 30).—Mid the pomp and splendor of their little kingdom the Lilliputians lead a life of peace and contentment under the wise and just rule of their beloved King Micros (height three feet). His daughter, Princess Piccolina (height 22 inches), loves the dashing cavalier, Prince Colibri, (height three feet three), and he loves her. King Micros gives his consent to the marriage and in the capital great rejoicing follows. Near the Lilliputian capital there dwells a race of super-giants, ruled by King Cigas-the-Tall (height seven feet). King Cigas also is a slave to the charms of Princess Piccolina and at the first news of her engagement to another the giant king flares into a rage. He orders the princess brought before him. This is easy for the giant messengers. The princess is riding in her pony cart in the palace grounds and the giants detach the pony, and picking up cart and princess, bear them away to the throne of the superman.

King Cigas-the-Tall, on his knees, offers his kingdom to the tiny princess. The proposal is spurned. King Cigas orders his erstwhile sweetheart imprisoned. Meanwhile, the news has spread to the furthermost ends of Lilliput. Talk of conquest fills the air. In the palace a council of war is being held. An ambassador is despatched to the Court of the Giants. Arriving there, he is placed on a table before the throne that all may hear him. The tiny diplomat demands the immediate release of the princess. The giants laugh derisively. Back to King Micros goes the minister with his report of failure. Prince Colibri, fiance of the princess, is appointed commander-in-chief of the Lilliput army and war is declared.

Though the giants are abnormally large and exceedingly strong, the Lilliputians outnumber them four to one. The Lilliputs mass their artillery at the gates of the Giant capital and after a heavy bombardment the portals open. Through the gate rushes a horde of midgets, fire in their eyes and armed to the teeth. The giants are taken completely by surprise and though they battle valorously, the vast number of their smaller antagonists forces them to surrender. Prince Colibri marches to the prison where his sweetheart is confined. She welcomes him with open arms as soon as she is released. King Cigas, unable to bear this sight, again proposes to the princess Piccolina. The outraged dwarfs throw him in the cell the princess has just vacated and keep him there until he agrees never to molest the Lilliputians again.

TOILERS OF THE SEA (May 11).—Captain Eric Scott refuses to put to sea in the unseaworthy craft, "Alden Bess." The captain's daughter, Jessie, loves, and is loved, by Jack, the shipowner's son. The shipowner is not averse to his own carrying on a flirtation with Jessie, but when he discovers that Jack's intentions are serious he advises Jack that if he marries the girl he will be disowned. Jack marries Jessie and is disowned. Six months later he finds himself with a wife on his hands and unable to get work. He appeals to his father in vain.

The owner of the "Alden Bess" has engaged a new captain and crew and the rotten plank is ready to sail. As a last resort in his search for work, Jack joins the crew. His wife, Jessie, carries the news to her father and Captain Scott rushes to the shipowner.

"Your son is a sailor on the 'Alden Bess'," says Scott. "Does your insurance cover him?" The shipowner becomes frantic. The father's love triumphs over the financier's inhumanity. He takes a motor boat and goes after the schooner. He promises his son that if he will desert the old ship all will be forgiven.

"If it is unsafe for me, it is unsafe for all," answered Jack. Needless to say, it was found unsafe for all and that was the end of the "Alden Bess." She was scrapped.

A MILLION IN PEARLS (Three parts—May 15).—Anne Harris, confidence worker, goes to a first-class jewelry store and selects several pearl necklaces. She requests Mr. Goldsmith, the jeweler, to bring these jewels to Dr. Johnson, of whom she pretends to be the wife, so that he may choose among the quantity, as he wishes to make her a present. She then goes to Dr. Johnson, an alienist, and tells him, with tears in her eyes, that her husband has had dangerous symptoms of lunacy, and that it is necessary that he should be put under the care of a specialist. "To induce him to come here," she says, "I had to tell him that you wished to see some jewels. He is on his way now, bringing the jewels with him."

Mr. Goldsmith, the jeweler, is announced. Dr. Johnson shows the would-be Mrs. Goldsmith into an adjoining room. Goldsmith enters with a casket under his arm. Two attendants seize him, put him into a straitjacket and drag him away. Dr. Johnson then comes back with the casket. The pretended Mrs. Goldsmith comes out. She thanks the doctor and is about to leave when the doctor calls her back and gives the casket which she was pretending to forget. She takes it and departs. Her car is waiting outside, with her husband, an accomplice. Concerned about his long absence, the real Mrs. Goldsmith visits Dr. Johnson. He has his new patient brought in. The doctor realizes that he has been duped and when he tries to explain the jeweler accuses him of being an accomplice. Dr. Johnson is arrested.

Detective Dungan, on his way to the doctor's home, gets a glimpse of Anne Harris, who is driving by. He recognizes her as an old offender and has her followed by another detective, who jumps on the back of her cab. When the pair stop in front of an inn to repair a tire, the detective jumps off, and going into the inn, phones headquarters. Emerging from the inn, he is just in time to see the Harrises driving off. Dungan arrives in his machine. There is a chase—matching of wits, and one detective nearly loses his life attempting to bring the thieves to bay. But the law triumphs in the end—the thieves are captured and Dr. Johnson is cleared of suspicion.

HUMANITY IN THE ROUGH (May 29).—Basil Hood, a stoker, is a physical giant. At a dance he meets Sadie Fuller, the daughter of the man he has thrashed for shirking his work. By thrashing a half drunken character and protecting Sadie from insult, Hood gains her good will. He follows her to her home and tells her he likes her. Sadie's father orders him away.

In the furnace room, Hood finds it a hard job to keep his temper in check when Fuller continues to throw the burden of the work upon him. When Arch Thomas questions Hood's privilege to force his presence on him when he is talking to Sadie, Hood again demonstrates his strength. Sadie objects to his domineering and animal-like ways, calling him a dog and a brute. He is hardly able to keep himself from mistreating Sadie. Three children have watched this scene and when playing show, mimic the actions of Hood. He sees himself as others see him, and realizes he is a brute.

Fuller and several other stokers who are nursing grudges against Hood for beatings received at his hands plan to "gang" him. They hear of his latest work on Arch Thomas and set out to do the job. Sadie learns their plans and tries to warn him. Hood tries to hold his own with the heavers and stokers. Sadie rushes in and protects him. She tells him she loves him. The police get the gangsters.

JOKER

THE FASCINATING EYE (May 16).—Can a clerk be honest who lives on Limburger and onions alone? Some may, but Willy Walrus cannot. He steals a pile of money from his boss and in the wild exuberance of his easy-got wealth the first thing he does is to get a clean collar from the laundry.

At the sweat shop he displays his wealth and meets his Waterloo, whose Christian name is Bess. She believes him to be a millionaire. Willy is overcome and hurries away to get a minister.

In the meantime the office boy, who is studying to be a detective—having seen Willy rob the safe—concludes that a robbery has been committed. He follows the scent of the Limburger to the sweat shop. Like Willy, he falls for Bess and goes for a minister.

About this time Willy's conscience begins to bother him and he returns the stolen money. The ceremony is started when the office boy arrives and claims Bess. The second ceremony no sooner begins than Willy turns up with his minister and claims Bess. At this point the boss arrives and accuses Willy of theft. Willy proves his innocence. The boss shows Bess that he alone has money and she marries him.

SCHULTZ THE BARBER (May 9).—Guards from the asylum are hunting for a lunatic when Schultz is impressed by his wife with the necessity of finding a job. He finds one in a barber shop, where the presiding tonsorial artist has been hastily summoned away by a family visit of Dr. Stork. Schultz essays to handle razor and shears and in the process flirts with the manicurist.

Victims of Schultz's bunglesome efforts finally conclude that he is crazy. They notify the guards that the man whom they seek has turned barber. They charge the barber shop. But Schultz escapes through a window. He seeks refuge, still pursued, in the house maintained by the wife of his boss. He is about to be dragged away to the asylum when a timely message notifies the guards that the escaped lunatic has been found hiding in a sugar barrel in the asylum.

THE CURE (May 27).—Polly is sick—possibly dying. She lies on the ground breathing heavily. Mrs. Corntossel bends over her in sad meditation. Mr. Corntossel sends Willy Walrus for the doctor. He is out of town and Willy carries the news to Dr. Carvem, a specialist spending a few days in the country.

"Polly is dying," says Willy and they hurry to the sick one. Polly is a cow. Carvem does not believe in fancy-sounding remedies. With the aid of a feather he lathers up Polly's face with soap and in five minutes she is upon her feet again.

So far so good. Carvem returns to his practice in the city. After months pass, Willy also goes to the city. Carvem is taken down with a serious case of the quinsy. Dr. Bunyon, the eccentric scientist, alone can save his life. In looking for Bunyon, Carvem's servants discover Willy and despite his objections persist in mistaking him for Bunyon. Willy is hurried to the sick room. He must do something for Carvem. He lathers Carvem's face with a feather. The effect is immediate. Carvem recovers.

STERLING

PAPA'S BOY (May 14).—Father and mother await their son for dinner. Son is busy with his companions, fighting over a pie. The pie lands in a policeman's face, and son beats it home. Now son loves blackberry jam and so does father. Father is sparing with his son, but generous with himself. Naturally the son resents; and that starts the trouble. Mother, meanwhile, is having her troubles in the kitchen with the cook and the steak. The steak catches fire and mother calls for help. Father runs out to assist. Billy goes for the jam. When father returns the jam is gone and so is Billy.

Billy retires to the back yard to flirt with the little lady across the way. Later, he makes a raid on the cupboard, while father sleeps, to get jam with which to satisfy his lady-love. During his absence a rival arrives; Billy and the rival, George, decide to fight it out. And while the lads fight, the girl makes off to share her jam with another boy. The two fighters discover her cruel deception and shake hands in their sorrow. Father —well, that is the finish, which is side-splitting.

HEARTS AND SWORDS (Two parts—May 28).—Springtime. Everything in nature is awakening. A pretty girl in a boat is drifting. Sterling sees the girl and becomes infatuated. At the same time another man sees the girl and he, too, falls in love. They pursue her in boats, each unaware of the other. The girl escapes on shore, where the two men meet and the rivalry begins. By a peculiar ruse Sterling manages to best the other rival and win the girl. He brings her to a lawn dance and makes a hit with the guests by bringing such a pretty girl. The other man in the meantime makes the acquaintance of a Salome dancer and surprises the party by appearing with her. The shapely form and grace of the beautiful dancer completely unbalances Sterling's mind and he rushes madly to her. The rival naturally objects and a sword duel is the result. The rivals turn out to be terrible cowards, and the affair of honor turns out to be a fiasco. In the mix-up that results the Salome dancer escapes into a public park, with the park police in hot pursuit, trying to cover her up. They are chased to a bridge where the rivals, in mortal combat, pitch headlong into the water sixty feet below. The efforts to save the rivals from drowning result in the most comical incidents imaginable.

NESTOR

THE PASSING OF THE BEAST (May 27).—Jacques watched through an opening in the foliage and saw Gilbert of the mounted police and his own wife exchange pleasant greetings. From that moment he hated the police officer. Gilbert was too fine-looking. The time came when Gilbert was shot by an outlaw. Jacques saw the affiar and killed the outlaw. He had a certain respect for the law and he was for justice. Gilbert was left for dead by Jacques.

Good intentions and the finer sentiment which men seek to hide are seldom taken into consideration by the law. Circumstances so arranged themselves that Jacques was accused of and arrested for the killing of the mounted officer. However, he escaped. In the trouble that ensued Jacques' wife was wounded by a timber thief and taken to police headquarters.

Once separated from his injured wife Jacques became another man and all his criticism turned inward upon himself. The new Jacques went to police headquarters and stole into the room where the woman lay hurt. He is captured and held to answer for the murder of Gilbert. He has no way of proving his innocence. There are only two men who could save him, Gilbert and the dead outlaw. Gilbert does save him. The wounded officer staggers to headquarters on regaining consciousness and tells how Jacques saved his life. The two enemies became the best of friends.

THE PHANTOSCOPE

A motion-picture projecting machine, for school-room, club-room, traveling salesmen, or for home entertainment. Its performance is a delight, and in appearance would grace any drawing-room. The Phantoscope weighs but eighteen pounds. You carry it into parlor, office or class-room, accept conditions just as you find them, and then go right ahead and give your exhibition. There is no special wiring, no preliminary preparation, no waiting. Isn't it significant that the large industrials are buying so many Phantoscopes—six, twelve, seventeen, twenty-five, and one concern has already bought fifty-one. This last order would have given any of you camera men or exchange men a nice commission, wouldn't it? Sharpen your pencil and figure how much you are missing. Then send a ten-dollar deposit and have us send you a Phantoscope C. O. D. The price is but $100 for Phantoscope, complete, in carrying case. The motor-driven Phantoscope is $125; and the big order referred to above was for motor-driven Phantoscopes.

CAPTAIN BILL'S WARM RECEPTION (May 29).—Captain Bill desires a respite from slashing seas and pitching decks. He decides to visit his nephew, Bob, a land-lubber with a pretty wife and home. Captain Bill's letter arrived. Bob and his wife visit a ship chandler's and purchase the necessary requisites to transform their domicile into a good imitation of a four-master. When Uncle Bill arrives he finds the maid and butler in sailor garb. He is ushered in with a horrapipe accompaniment. While he dines, the butler rocks the table and the maid sings "Davy Jones' Locker."

Uncle Bill steers a safe course until eight bells. In order that he may "turn in" without a feeling of loneliness, the butler and maid splash his bedroom window with garden hose. He sleeps, but is rudely awakened when a pane of glass and the water come hurtling in. Bob and his wife rescue Uncle Bill from imminent drowning. The veteran grows wrothy over his mistreatment, but is placated when Bob and his wife explain that they were thinking only of his comfort.

THE PURSUIT OF HATE (May 28).—Diana Grave's husband has left her, preferring any life to that of living with a woman who is not congenial to him. Howbeit, her husband gone is a different matter than her husband present. She commissioned a detective to locate him. Out on a lonely stretch of fertile land a solitary ranchwoman was whiling away the days of her life. One day a stranger arrived with a boy, a small girlish-looking fellow. He attracted and was attracted by the ranchwoman. They were of the same true metal. The man was Diana's husband.

Diana learned of his whereabouts as soon after him. She explained to the ranchwoman. The ranchwoman answered, "If you hate him be glad be left you, and if you love him you will sacrifice yourself for his happiness and leave him alone." Diana left him alone. One night while the ranchwoman was watching his camp she saw the stranger's shadow against the tent. He was fondling a girl's abundant hair. This boy, then, who traveled with him was in reality a girl or a woman.

The ranchwoman's philosophy then came home to her in all its bitterness. "If you love him you will sacrifice yourself for his happiness and leave him alone." She decides to make the sacrifice. When she arrived home, however, a letter was waiting her from Diana. It read in part: "I guess you are right. He has a daughter that I can't bear and he won't live without her, so we had better separate. I am going home."

THE AWAKENING (May 31).—Beatrice comes to the fishing village to gather local color to be used in her painting. She falls in love with a young fisherman, a fine type of manhood. Upon an invitation he consents to pose for her and to make sure of his service until the canvas is completed, she allows him to think that possibly she might care for him. He becomes a slave to her. She allows him to go on loving her deeper every day. His own sweetheart of the fishing village is brokenhearted.

The picture is almost finished when the artist invites the fisherman to accompany her to the city that the finishing touches may be made in her studio. Once in the city the fisherman's eyes begin to open. He finds that she already has a fiance, an artist like herself. In fact, he comes to know that she was merely flirting with him, leading him on that she might use him to further her art. Did he simply resign himself to the inevitable, return to his village and marry his fisher-girl sweetheart? Yes, he did that, but he did something else first. He took a knife and transformed the painting of himself into a pile of painted fragments.

THROUGH THE SNOW (May 11).—Old Carns, dying, tells his young wife that he wants her to send for his lawyer. She asks why. He tells her that he wants to alter his will. She is furious, as she had expected to get it all. She does not want to send for the lawyer, but he insists.

The lawyer arrives. Carns tells him that he wishes to make a will, leaving half his money to a man called Clark, as he did Clark's father a great wrong. The wife, listening, makes a note of the address, and after the lawyer has gone she wires to a pal called Davidson, to go to No. 3 Green street, and prevent, if possible, Clark getting there before the old man dies.

Clark gets the lawyer's message and at once starts off. Shortly afterward Davidson arrives at his home and discovers that he has gone. He follows. He manages to get Clark's train and make his acquaintance. The train becomes snowbound. Clark decides to walk. Davidson accompanies him.

They push their way through the snow. All the time Davidson is doing his best to keep Clark back. He manages to throw him down a cliff and then steal his papers of identification. In the meantime the doctor has told the wife that the end is near. When Davidson arrives the wife gets him to pose as Clark. As the old man has never seen him, and as he has the papers of identification, he is satisfied and sends for the lawyer. But Clark arrives in the nick of time; the wife and her pal are turned out.

ON THE CHESS BOARD OF FATE (Two parts—May 14).—The play opens when Colonel Gillard loses his money through the failure of a mining company, and monopolizes that of his brother, who is an inmate of an insane asylum belonging to a Dr. Jacques. Jacques exercises a hypnotic influence over his patients. Dr. Jacques forces the brother, under a hypnotic spell, to make out a will in his favor just before he dies. Armed with this will the doctor visits the colonel. But the colonel has squandered his brother's money, and this the doctor finds out in time. With this information the doctor blackmails the colonel into promising him Grace, his daughter, in marriage. Jack, Grace's sweetheart, hears of this and declares himself against the brutal arrangement.

Later, the colonel and the doctor have a quarrel, resulting in the former being murdered. As the doctor is about to leave the house, Grace enters and observes the body of her father. Dr. Jacques hypnotizes her into the belief that she killed her father and then takes her away. Grace is kept prisoner in the doctor's house. Isabel, the doctor's fiancee, becomes jealous of Grace. The doctor, learning of this, attempts to get Isabel out of the way by poisoning her. Isabel learns of the plan and crosses it with one of her own. She learns of Jack's existence and sends for him. Jack, Grace's sweetheart, arrives when the doctor is trying to force an entrance into Grace's room. There is a duel with foils on the stairway between the two men—the doctor and Jack. The doctor is defeated and later confesses everything, while Jack and Grace consummate their love in marriage.

AN OLD RAG DOLL (May 18).—The opening of the story we see Mr. and Mrs. Bill Wright with their two children, Katherine and Jane, entirely happy. We see that Bill takes a little drink, but never too much. He bids his happy little family farewell and goes to work. The children play while the mother does her housework. It is evening. The mother is getting dinner. Bill has stopped in the saloon. He drinks too much, has a quarrel with one of his best friends and goes home. He is not staggering, he is just whiskey-cranky. Mother can see that something is wrong. He loses his temper, and smashes the dishes. Wife approaches him, he shouts, she cries, babies run away to hide. Up to the old attic they go. Katherine with her little rag doll in one hand, her two-year-old baby sister in the other. In the trunk they crawl. We see the lock catching. The rag doll has fallen in the front of the trunk as the children got in.

Downstairs one word leads to another; the husband turns the wife from the house. She wanders the streets. He decides to go back to the saloon. Mother is sitting on park bench, heartbroken. Husband is in saloon. The children scream. There is no answer. Mother comes home determined to take her children away with her. She can't find them. She is frantic. A neighbor tells her that her husband is across the street in the saloon. She rushes across and tells him his children are lost. That pulls him together. Together they go home. The husband and wife arrive in the house and search. Slowly Katherine becomes unconscious. At length the little tots are found through the rag doll on the floor. Husband and wife soon resuscitate them, and the last picture shows peace and happiness in the home again.

THE LINK IN THE CHAIN (Two parts—May 27).—Mr. Goodwin, head of the Crown Jewel Company, has poor health and consequently often transacts his business at home. He is a kind-hearted employer, and his two assistants, Rogers and Burton, have little to complain of. Burton is the father of a beautiful daughter, Marie, who is loved by Rogers. However, she rejects his suit, preferring charity work in the slums. Here she is known as "the little angel."

Goodwin keeps in his private vault the famous Zuleika necklace, looked upon as the most valuable piece of jewelry in the world. Prof. Sanderson, learning of this, is seized with an uncontrollable desire to possess the jewel. Knowing its workmanship, he duplicates it in paste. Following this, by a clever ruse, he gains entrance to Goodwin's home as a doctor to attend the ailing jeweler. He succeeds in duplicating the paste for the genuine and making his escape without arousing suspicion. The next morning Rogers seizes an opportunity to steal the jewel, unaware that he is taking only a paste imitation. He drops in the vault a flower that was worn to the house that morning by Marie's father. When the loss of the jewel is discovered this flower and other circumstantial evidence succeeds in convicting Marie's father of the crime.

As the story is developed from here on, we have Marie attempting to make her own living and finally seeking refuge in the slums among her only friends; the second meeting between herself and Prof. Sanderson, the desperate efforts to replace the jewel and the great sacrifice Sanderson makes to save Marie, whom he has unwittingly caused to suffer.

THE BAR CROSS LIAR (May 31).—The Bar Cross liar is a ragamuffin whom the entire Bar Cross ranch considers a disgrace to its outfit. The boys tell him with disgust, that he had better quit saving to buy the ranch and secure some decent duds to wear; that if he does not improve in appearance he cannot go to the Christmas ball.

Time passes. It is by accident that one of the cowboys discovers that the "liar" has been using all his money to support an aged father and mother. When he carries this news back to the cowboys, who have damned the "liar" in every possible way, the boys are ashamed and the true generosity of the West is evidenced when they decide to make up to the "kid." They visit the boss and are assured that the boy will get his raise in salary. Then they chuck an able bodied man out of his job and bring on the father and mother, giving the job to the father and explaining to the amazed family, who find the cottage completely furnished that "Coffee," the aforesaid able bodied man, did not stay to take the furnishings with him.

When the Christmas party comes on, one of the boys brings in the "Liar," who from the way he is summoned believes he is about to be fired. What is his surprise when he is greeted with a welcoming volley from the merrymakers and his mother clasps him to her heart. The "Liar" is presented with a complete new outfit, including a silver mounted saddle, as a token of the outfit's esteem.

FAMILY TROUBLES (May 25).—Two family men, possessed of trusting wives, decide to go hunting. The wife of one of the men goes through her husband's pockets and finds a letter from the other husband, which tells him to call for the two sisters and bring them along. Two sisters! The wretches! Wifey number one visits wifey number two. The wives go to the station and misfortune, of course, insists that two pretty girls go into the car ahead of the husbands. Proof positive! The outraged ladies go to a lawyer and insist upon divorces. The lawyer gets busy.

Wifey number one decides to go and live with wife number two. The husbands return. Husband number one arrives home and sees a woman, through the window, kissing a man. He rushes in only to find a new couple he has never seen before. They promptly throw him out. The lawyer promptly finds out the husband's whereabouts and serves the papers. Matters are brought to a crisis and explanations ensue and the two wives learn that the "Two Sisters" are a brand of cigars. Two of them are soon alight, and two forgiving husbands listen to the many excuses and apologies of two tearful wives.

THE ADVENTURES OF LIMBURGER AND SCHWEITZER (Two Parts—May 11).—The audience is taken from the Maderist headquarters in New York to the Mexican Capitol, with the conspirators using the comedians, Raymond and Caverly, to convey dynamite bombs in the guise of eggs to Huerta. Word of their expected arrival is received by Huerta and his generals. The comedians are captured and sentenced to be shot at sunrise. Villa causes a rebellion of the troops and seizes the palace. Huerta and his generals are cast into the prison of the palace. The rebels make Raymond president, mistaking him for the man the Maderists wish. His first official action is to pardon his companion and then hold a big reception.

After this the pair visit Huerta and in a burlesque way, torture him with visions of food. The conspirators come to the palace and realizing that a mistake has been made, are about to shoot the comedian when the captain of the U. S. gunboat, hearing of the plight of the two Germans, sends a party of the bluejackets to their aid.

They sweep the streets clear of Mexican soldiers and take the palace, rescuing the comedians and place the city under the rule of the Stars and Stripes.

THE TRANSFORMATION OF PRUDENCE (May 15).—Prudnce, a pretty girl, who has become the wife of John Marlow, wealthy club man, finds her husband to be fast becoming subject to the blandishments of other women. She knows of no set rules for holding him secure. She overhears him tell another woman, "My wife is impossible—she is too old fashioned." Forthwith she sets out to disprove his belief. She learns to tango and also to array herself according to Dame Fashion's latest dictates.

Fortified by the latest acquired finesse and converted from a simply dressed little Quakeress to a ravishing beauty via the modiste's and hairdresser's art, she invades a ball room where her neglectful husband is paying court to the other woman. The effects and results are instantaneous. Prudence wins back her husband, who begs her to remain the little Quakeress—promising in return his steadfast love.

LUCILLE LOVE, THE GIRL OF MYSTERY (Series No. 3—Two parts).—At the opening of the third chapter, Lucille Love is discovered more dead than alive on the beach of the South Sea Island, where she had been cast by the storm which had wrecked the small boat in which she escaped from the burning liner "Empress." As she regained consciousness she makes sure that she has the papers which she had taken from Loubeque, the return of which will save her father and sweetheart from disgrace. She has them in the bosom of her dress.

As she looks about she sees a band of savages and tries to escape. They overtake her and make her captive. The savages, however, seem to consider her a sacred being, and the chief takes her to his hut, where his little daughter is sick, and asks Lucille to cure her. Lucille sets to work and nurses the chief's daughter. She quiets her and makes her comfortable. The chief then assigns a house to her and in the sign language tells her that she will be perfectly safe there.

In this hut Lucille for the first time learns the secret of Loubeque's life through reading his diary and seeing the picture of her own mother.

When the crisis of the illness of the chief's little daughter is past, and she recovers, the chief is extravagant in his praise, and gives her a sacred amulet, or charm, in the shape of a white elephant. By virtue of his sacred object all the natives become Lucille's slaves. The chief hangs the charm about Lucille's neck, and as a token of service she has tendered she is permitted to ride the holy elephant as a mark of the royal favor, and all the natives bow before her.

But Loubeque has escaped the fury of the waves, too, and has been cast up on the same island which is now Lucille's refuge. Loubeque sees the honor which is being conferred upon the girl who has the secret dispatches which she took from the desk in his cabin, and he is filled with hate and determination to get them back. There comes upon the scene at this moment a native of an anarchistic turn of mind, who hates anything which has to do with the white woman. Loubeque sees him and by virtue of their common cause they join forces. Loubeque, however, chokes the savage nearly to death to show him who is master.

Together they plot to make away with Lucille. Soon an opportunity offers. Lucille is restless and as she is regarded as a sacred person and can go anywhere without harm, she wanders on the sand dunes. The native, Loubeque's new slave, surprises her and starts to strangle her. In a moment it would have all been over had not the sacred amulet, which the chief had hung about her neck, escaped from her dress and attracted the attention of the savage. The talisman works. He desists and bows three times before her. She is saved.

But Loubeque will not be defeated so easily. He plots to drive Lucille out of her hut so that he can search it for the dispatches, and for that purpose he and the native catch snakes and put them through the grass walls of Lucille's hut. Lucille, of course, is terrified and runs out into the night. Loubeque searches the hut, but cannot find the papers and goes away more angry and determined than ever. The girl fears to stay there and resolves to escape through the jungle. She goes to the chief's hut, but decides not to waken him and slips away into the doubly dark shadows of the jungle. But nothing can escape the crafty eye of the spy. He has followed every movement of the girl, who does not even suspect that her enemy is on the island.

Loubeque is not the only enemy that Lucille has to contend with. The jungle is full of wild beasts, and she has not gone far before she encounters a ferocious lion. Lucille is horrified and tries desperately to escape.

LUCILLE LOVE, THE GIRL OF MYSTERY (Series No. 4—2 parts—May 4).—As the fourth installment opens the lion is trying to break down the door of the desperate girl's shelter, and is only foiled by a spear in Lucille's terrified hands. But Loubeque is not so easy to turn from his purpose of recovering the papers, which mean the accomplishment of his revenge and the disgrace of General Love. He instructs his native slave to collect dry grass and teaches him how to weave a rope. This he stretches from his own hut to Lucille's and ignites the end in his hut. In a short time the fire eats its way to the hut where the daughter of his enemy is asleep.

To make assurance doubly sure, Loubeque's native summons the tribe to which he belongs, and which is hostile to that by which Lucille was captured, to assist him. Lucille, scarcely awakened from her sleep, is driven from the hut by the fire and almost runs into the arms of Loubeque. He struggles with her and attempts to seize the papers. But Lucille's savages are at hand and attack the spy before he can recover the papers. The natives, however, are very superstitious and deathly afraid of the "imprisoned fire" in Loubeque's automatic revolver. One shot is enough. The tribe falls down before him in fear and subjection.

In the meantime Lucille has made good her escape and has entered the chief's hut. But while the natives are afraid of the white man, they are not afraid of the savages which support him, and a terrible battle ensues between the rival tribes.

In order to stop the carnage, Lucille resolves to take advantage of the superstitions of the natives and dresses herself all in white, improvising her garments from sacks and white cloths. Climbing on the great white elephant she goes among the warriors and the fighting ceases like magic. All bow down to the sacred objects, the color white, the sacred elephant and the sacred healing woman.

But Loubeque is not discouraged and at this juncture there comes to his assistance an ally in the person of a woman from the tribe to which his slave belongs. After discussing ways and means, Loubeque decides to try a clever bit of deception on Lucille. He sends the woman to the chief, in whose house Lucille is carefully guarded, with instructions to tell the chief that she is from a neighboring tribe which is friendly. She is to say her master lies ill and at the point of death, and that she has heard of the wonderful white healing woman who cured the chief's daughter, and had been sent to get her to heal her master.

The ruse succeeds, both the chief and Lucille herself are completely taken in and Lucille starts immediately on horseback with the false guide. In the meantime her companion, under Loubeque's direction, has dug a pitfall and cleverly covered it with brush. When Lucille's horse comes cantering down the trail bearing his rider on her errand of mercy both crash into the pit, in one of the most sensational pictures thus far shown in the series. The horse is killed instantly and Lucille lies like one dead. The two slaves of Loubeque climb down into the pit, and the woman takes the papers from the bodice of Lucille's dress. She returns them in triumph to her new master, who decides that while he lacks the sacred amulet which is still around Lucille's neck, his present mission is but half accomplished.

THE SOMNAMBULIST (May 17).—Bill is a sleepwalker, and tries his wife's patience by wandering during the wee small hours of the morning. To provide against future trouble, May sews his name and address on the back of his pajamas. But that doesn't stop Bill. The next time he rambles he goes via the fire-escape and after a trip across a roof, finds himself in Tom's room in a hotel, where he wakes up. Discovering May's absence and Tom's presence, he imagines dire things have happened to May before he gets his bearings, and summons help. The day clerk has gone home and the night clerk doesn't recognize Tom as a transient, and aided by a cop, gets Tom down stairs, where the bell hop recognizes him. Then they get after Bill. But Bill, in the meantime, has discovered he's in wrong, dons Tom's clothes and makes his escape, making his way back to his bed. May has discovered his absence, and started the legal machinery in motion to round him up, but when she returns Bill's escapade has already been discovered, and the cop brings back his pajamas. May finds Bill in bed, and to provide further for future trouble, makes a hangman's noose at the end of a piece of rope, puts it around Bill's neck and ties the other end where Bill can't reach it. To keep away sleepwalkers, Tom fixes up an automatic window-releasing trigger attachment that spells doom to Bill the next time he wanders.

THE DOG OF FLANDERS (Two Parts—May 19).—Nello was a little boy who lived with his aged grandfather near Antwerp. They were very poor, but because they loved each other so much were happier than many persons who enjoyed luxury. The child's only friend, outside of her grandfather, was an animal, who has gone down in history as "A Dog of Flanders." The dog was owned by a cruel tinker who forced him to draw heavy loads and repaid his labor with curses and blows. Finally, the animal broke down under his inhuman usage, and his heartless owner left him by the roadside, to die. There he was found by little Nello, who tenderly nursed him back to health.

The grandfather could do nothing for his living but limp about a little with a small cart with which he carried daily the milk cans of those happier neighbors who owned cattle, away into the town of Antwerp. One morning the dog, unbidden, stepped into the shafts of the cart and signified in dumb fashion that he propel it was his work. The old man was daily growing weaker, and found occasion to bless the time that he had taken the ill-treated dog into his humble home.

Finally the old man grew so weak that he had to remain in the cottage while Nello and the dog cheerfully became the bread winners of the family. The boy's secret ambition was to be a great artist and whenever he had an opportunity he would slip into the cathedral at Antwerp to stand, spellbound, before the masterpiece of the great Rubens. With no one to aid him, and with only rough brown paper and charcoal as his implements he toiled away hopefully.

Near Nello's home lived a rich miller, whose little daughter, Alois, frequently played with Nello. The miller was purse proud, and finally forbade the poor boy to come to his house, telling him that when his daughter grew up he intended she should make a rich marriage. Nello felt his dismissal keenly.

The boy was ambitious and sketched industriously. About this time there was a competition in Antwerp, open to all untrained artists under the age of 18. The cash prize was large, but in addition the winner's artistic future was assured. Nello submitted a drawing with high hopes, but the prize was awarded to the son of an influential citizen, although later it was admitted that little Nello's sketch was by far the better, and best.

Returning home brokenhearted, he found that his aged grandfather had died, and creditors seized the things in the cottage, and the boy and the dog were turned out to shift for themselves. While making their way through a bad snowstorm one day, Nello suddenly unearths a wallet, containing lots of money. Although Nello was hungry and penniless, he would not touch a cent of the money in the wallet, but immediately turned around and started for the house—the miller's house—the miller who had lost it was out searching frantically for it. Nello gave the wallet to the wife, and asked her to take care of his dog, in his old age. And saying good-bye to the dog, he went out into the storm once more. The miller returned a little later, the dog fled from the house as he entered. The miller was very sorry that he had been so mean to the poor little boy and his dog, and wished that he could make amends, but Nello and his faithful friend lie in the one grave side by side, and the people of Antwerp always tell the story of "A Dog of Flanders."

His action is overseen by the hostler, who threatens to tell, and is knocked unconscious by the ringmaster.

During the performance Papita is thrown from her horse and sustains a fractured kneecap. The doctor, who was at the performance with his sister, attends her, and takes her to his home. THE LOST SERMON (Two Parts—May 25).—John Strong, a young clergyman, in charge of a city church, fails in health. He is ordered by his physician to resign and live in the country for a year. He accepts the position of schoolmaster in a country school. Among his pupils is Rosamond Day, a girl of seventeen, living with her grandmother. Their palatial home is heavily mortgaged. The man who holds a lien on the property, George Phillips, desires to marry Rosamond. He is an avaricious creature. A romantic feeling is awakened between Rosamond and John Strong. John, believing her to be wealthy, does not ask her to marry him on account of his situation in life, and at the end of the term the two sorrowfully part, compelled by circumstances to go their separate ways, each passing, save for memory, completely out of the other's life.

Phillips now resorts to a desperate measure to make Rosamond his wife. Mrs. Day is unable to meet the interest on the loan. Phillips tells her in her despair that he will cancel all her debts if she will give him Rosamond. Otherwise he will foreclose at once, and the two will be left penniless. For Rosamond's sake Mrs. Day wavers. The girl is sent for. She faces the terrible ordeal with proud and valiant spirit. But for her grandmother's sake she nerves herself to make the sacrifice. Just before she places her hand in Phillip's she goes to her grandmother's side and bends down to kiss her on the brow. Awed and terrified, she draws back, for death has settled the question for her.

At once Phillips forecloses the mortgage and Rosamond goes out into the world alone to fight the battle of life. Knowing nothing of John Strong, she goes to the same city in which he is living. John has been called to a large city church, where he works mainly among the poorer classes. One day he receives a letter from his uncle, a distinguished clergyman in another city, inviting him to fill his pulpit on the following Sunday. John is overjoyed and goes to work with great enthusiasm upon his sermon.

Just at this juncture Rosamond's situation becomes complicated. She has obtained employment as a stenographer for a wealthy old gentleman and in the course of her work she finds her employer to be a friend of Phillips whom she fears to meet so she resigns. In vain she seeks another position. Despair takes hold of her and her faith in Providence falters.

John finishes the sermon that is to make him famous. He is about to leave when word comes to him of trouble among his parishioners. The sermon is put in a leather case in his pocket. He loses it in the excitement that follows.

In the meantime Phillips comes to the city, learns from his friend, the former employer of his stenographer quitting, looks her up and as he supposed he would, finds Rosamond. After an altercation the girl flees and in fright she rushes through the streets until almost exhausted, she stops to rest at a new building when she finds the minister's leather case lying in the dust near the curbing. She picks it up. Some of the children playing nearby sees her find something and begs her take it with her. In the street where the sermon was lost John Strong comes upon the children who saw Rosamond pick up the leather case. John is directed to Rosamond's boarding house. The two meet, the dream of years is realized and each sees how, through a mysterious working, disappointment and distress have only lead to a better thing.

SHELTERING AN INGRATE (May 27).—Longwood, an escaped convict, applies for a position at the ranch of Cole and is given a position as cowboy. He and Mona, one of Cole's daughters, become very much interested in each other, although her heart is supposed to be given to Ray, the foreman. A race is to be run by heats. Ray and Longwood have to enter the finals. As the boys are discussing the coming heat, Longwood sneaks up and cuts three-fourths of the way through the cinch in the final race as the boys are running neck and neck, the cinch of Ray's horse breaks and he is thrown to the ground. He is carried off the field unconscious. The cinch is examined and found to be cut. A boy who saw Longwood cut the cinch now speaks up. Longwood is about to be seized when the sheriff recognizes Longwood from a photograph which he has of an escaped convict, and the prisoner is led away. Nan and Ray come to a better understanding regarding their love affair.

KAY-BEE.

THE SOCIAL GHOST (Two Parts—May 22).—Tom Banners' mother is an invalid. Their money gone, and no food in the house, Tom, who is about fourteen years old, starts out to find work. But he is rather small for his age, a delicate looking little chap, and no one will have him. In despair he sinks down on a bench in the park to rest, his faithful dog, Mike, sitting ever watchful at his side. Suddenly he is conscious of a little girl standing before him, holding out a bag of candy. He helps himself shyly. The little girl looks at Mike admiringly, and Tom tells himself that she is the very prettiest and nicest little girl he has ever seen. But, at that moment, up rushes an irate pervaige in cap and apron who drags his new friend away. Tom is again in despair. He wanders round and round the park, and half an hour later finds himself by the duck pond. There he spies the little girl throwing biscuit to the ducklings. The next instant, her arms fly up and her feet slide from under her on the slippery bank. Splash! Mike pricks up his ears, and dashes in after her.

That same evening, when Ethel's father goes to find the boy and the dog and reward them for saving his little daughter's life, he meets face to face the wife who deserted him twelve years before. Repentence for cruel neglect in the past speaks from his eyes, from his whole bearing, as he kneels by the bedside of the sick woman. Husband and wife, brother and sister are reunited. And the father wins his boy's heart completely when he rescues Mike next day from the city dog pond.

DOMINO.

THE FIRES OF AMBITION (Two Parts—May 21).—Jim Patton and Joe Braly are partners in a mining claim. Jim forces a quarrel over the division of their first cleanup, and thinking he has killed Joe, puts his body in a canoe and lets it float down the river where, later, Joe, stunned, but still breathing, is found by the Indians. The redmen take him home and nurse him back to health. But with the restoration of his bodily vigor, his mind remains like that of a little child. All memory of his history, and of his identity, has forsaken him.

Jim disposes of the ill-gotten claim at a big price, and is elected to Congress by the wealthy cattle interest of his district. He meets the beautiful daughter of Senator Carew, and thinking that marriage with her will further his political ambitions, he divorces his wife. Patton and Senator Carew pass a bill providing for Indian reservations. They are called to a Western fort to confer with the chiefs, among whom is Joe Braly. The sight of Jim brings back Joe's memory, and he plans revenge. Joe, whom Patton fails to recognize in his Indian dress, promises that the Indians shall go peacefully onto the reservation. He then orders the redmen to watch all trails from the fort. They attack the stage, taking Patton captive. Making himself known to Patton, Joe binds his hands together, ties a canteen of water around his neck, and turns him loose in the desert.

BREED O' THE NORTH (Two Parts—May 20).—Billy Gordon and Pierre Deschamps both aspire to marry Joan Froulard. Gordon wins out, and Deschamps, in a jealous rage, slanders the girl in the community. His evil tales reach Gordon's ears. He compels the "Frenchy" to apologize to Joan and to the settlers, and then drives him from the town. Several years pass. Gordon and his wife, Joan, are living in a lumbering town further north. Deschamps happens to come there to work in the camp. He gets into a quarrel with his foreman, whom he kills, and makes his escape. The lumbermen start to track the murderer and Gordon joins them, unconscious of the identity of the man they are seeking. Meanwhile, Deschamps has applied at Gordon's cottage for shelter. Joan fails to recognize him with the heavy growth of beard he now wears. Supposing him an honest lumberman worn out with travel, she hospitably welcomes him. That night Deschamps cuts off his beard and goes into Joan's room. A fierce struggle ensues, in which she loses consciousness. Deschamps carries her to the top of a high cliff and is on the point of flinging her over onto the rocks below, when Gordon leaps out of the thicket. The next instant, Joan is in her husband's arms, and Deschamps is lying senseless under the precipice.

RELIANCE

OUR MUTUAL GIRL (No. 18—May 18).—Margaret, "Our Mutual Girl," was not destined long to enjoy the company of her old sweetheart, Bob King, for he was called back to the city. He kissed Margaret good-bye as he left the farm.

"I won't forget you," was his cheery farewell.

The next day "Our Mutual Girl" felt a longing for the city, so kissing her mother good-bye, she took the train back to the metropolis.

On arriving at her aunt's home, Margaret found that Mrs. Knickerbocker had received a letter from Ada Taylor, the little girl whom "Our Mutual Girl" rescued from an East Side dive and placed at work in a big department store. Old friends of Ada's from the days when she frequented the dance halls had hounded her, with the result that she had lost her position, been arrested and sent to Blackwell's Island.

Margaret immediately called up Dr. Katherine Bement Davis, New York's woman commissioner of corrections, and made an appointment for the next day.

That evening "Our Mutual Girl" saw Mizzi Hajos and Charles Meakins in "Sari," the musical comedy success reigning in New York.

The next day Margaret called on Inez Milholland Boissevain. She interested the famous woman lawyer and suffragist in Ada Taylor's cause. Mrs. Boissevain went to the Judge in the Jefferson Market Court, had Ada's case reopened and secured an order for the girl's release.

Armed with this order "Our Mutual Girl" accompanied by Commissioner Davis went to Blackwell's Island. There she had Ada released and for the second time Margaret took the little waif home with her.

OUR MUTUAL GIRL (No. 19—May 25).—On the morning after procuring Ada's release from Blackwell's Island, Margaret woke bright and early. Her little protege, worn out with her recent hardships, was still sleeping.

"I'll not rouse her," thought Margaret, "after those hard cots, a real bed must feel so good."

"Our Mutual Girl" and her aunt spent the forenoon reviewing the Spring fashion display at Stern Brothers. Meanwhile, at the Knickerbocker mansion, Ada Taylor had waked, dressed and breakfasted. She sat in Margaret's dainty boudoir, debating with herself whether she should accept her deliverer's generosity. After considerable mental struggle, she decided to slip away as quietly as possible. The news of her release had reached the East Side, and she had been "shadowed" to Margaret's house by her former sweetheart of the dance hall. Thus it happened that when she was stealing away, she ran into the arms of "Kid Joseph."

"Come over in the park, Ada, I want to talk to you," he urged. "This dame ain't slipping you the pad and the eats because she likes your sort. She's got a society bug and thinks you're a little classier than a pet dog. Bye and bye she'll tie a can onto you; then you won't have no pals, no nothin'. Better stick along with me."

Thus persuaded, Ada went back to the East Side.

Almost at the same hour, on her way home in the motor, Margaret rescued Ada's brother from the police. He had yielded to the old temptation and made an attempt—unsuccessful, however—to break into a store window where crisp bills were displayed. When they reached home they found Ada gone. Her brother knew whom to suspect, and Margaret would have lost no time in following him to her protege's rescue, had not Mrs. Knickerbocker put her foot down. A half hour later, nevertheless, "Our Mutual Girl" stole out of the house on her perilous quest of Ada Taylor.

THE INTRUDER (May 31).—Madge, the wife of Hugh Winchester, is unhappy with her husband, who is a cold, domineering type. While wandering about the grounds of the Winchester estate, she meets a young man who has left his motorcycle in the bushes and is eating a lunch under the trees. They talk and she finds him very interesting. The next day they meet again, purposely.

The stranger is fascinated by Madge and thinking she is the daughter of the house, stays outside the gate until dark and then sneaks up to the mansion. Through one of the long windows of the drawing-room he sees her lying on the couch, a telegram in her hand. She has just received word from her husband that he will not be home that night. The young man enters and rouses her. Her tell-tale eyes and flushed, downcast looks, confess more plainly than words that she has been thinking of the stranger. Scarcely have they had time to talk, however, when they hear someone coming. The intruder turns off the lights and takes refuge behind the window curtains. Madge lies down on the couch and pretends to be half asleep.

The husband declares he has heard voices. He turns on the lights and discovers the stranger. Realizing that Madge is this man's wife, the intruder professes to be an ordinary thief. Handing his revolver to Madge, the husband goes to phone the police. Madge signs to the stranger to make his escape, and when Winchester returns, he finds his wife in a dead faint on the floor.

IZZY THE OPERATOR (May 20).—Izzy Hupp is appointed night operator at the little western town of Tropico. Being a stranger in the town, he causes much amusement to the natives by his size and dress. While looking over the little town he renders a service to Miss Myrtle Ferns, the belle of Tropico, and incurs the enmity of Bud Kelton, a western loafer, who thinks to frighten Izzy by bluffing him. Izzy gives Bud a good thrashing. Bud makes Myrtle believe Izzy a coward. Izzy hunts for Bud to prove the coward part. Bud and Red Roger plan to disgrace Izzy by robbing the little station, but Izzy blinds them by throwing tobacco in their eyes and thus saving the property, besides winning Myrtle as his assistant for life.

FOR THE SAKE OF KATE (Two parts—May 23).—Tom Jennings is in love with Cherry, a dance hall girl, and intends marrying her against his father's (Sheriff Jennings') wishes. Angry at his father's refusal, Tom leaves home. After wandering about the country he falls in love with a notorious outlaw, though he does not know who the latter is, and while together the outlaw leaves Tom one night in camp, rides to the home town

Here Are á Few Opinions on

The Perils of Pauline

Ditmas Theatre, Perth Amboy, N. J.
We have found the drawing powers of this picture to be tremendous. We are more than pleased with the results we have had.

Gustav Baron

M. & S. Amusement Co., Newark, N. J.
"The Perils of Pauline" has been doing a business far beyond all expectations. We have more than tripled our business on the nights we show Pauline.

H. Sh. Hess Treas.

Wm. Fox Circuit, New York.
We wish to congratulate you on the big scoop you have made with "The Perils of Pauline." It is the biggest feature picture ever produced.

A. Cook

The Grand Theatre, Batavia, N. Y.
"The Perils of Pauline" scored one of the biggest successes ever known in this theatre. The box-office receipts are far beyond my expectations.

Geo. F. Eckhardt

The Amuse-U, Charlotte, N. C.
When I agreed to run "The Perils of Pauline" I was naturally nervous. Now I must say that it is the biggest drawing-card and the biggest money-getter I have ever shown.

C. A. Harris

Griffin Amusement Co., Griffin, Ga.
This only fault my patrons find with "The Perils of Pauline" is that it is not a two years' serial. It certainly is a money-getter and the crowds are getting larger every week.

E. H. Davis

A DEVIL-SENT CHANCE

THE WILY CHINEE

INFATUATION

Crystal Theatre, Greenville, Texas.
Of all the drawing-cards yet produced I have never seen anything that equals "The Perils of Pauline."

J. L. Jones

Southern Amusement Co., Jacksonville, Fla.
We are showing this feature on Monday, which has usually been a dull day with us. Now our Monday receipts are more than $60 greater than they were before we started to show "The Perils of Pauline." It is a great picture, and we are naturally much pleased.

W. A. Lawrence

Rochester Theatre Co., Rochester, N. Y.
We consider "The Perils of Pauline" an excellent drawing-card. We can gladly recommend it to any exhibitor as absolutely the best of the serial films we have ever used.

Jno. J. Jones

Savoy Theatre, Syracuse, N. Y.
I have run three releases of "The Perils of Pauline," and have turned people away at each showing.

J. J. Lardino

Diamond Theatre Co., Tuscaloosa, Ala.
We ran the first two episodes on matinee days and played to capacity audiences on each occasion. The third episode came on a beautiful day, and we moved it to our new theatre, which seats five hundred people, and there played to capacity.

It's Just About Time YOU Booked

The Perils of Pauline

You Are Losing Money

every day you neglect to get in your order for this great series that is coining money for the exhibitors who have been showing it. Did you read what the wise men say? They are the men who were alive and recognized an opportunity to make money when they saw it. Some of them signed in fear and trembling, but they are the happiest men in the business to-day.

You Can Get The Money

in your town by booking Pauline right away. Get the first episode and all the others. If you wish, do as one big exhibitor in New York City did, run the episodes once a week till you catch up to the schedule, and then keep on running the future episodes as they are released. It sure means money to you.

A LITTLE FLIRTATION

PAULINE THINKS HARRY FALSE

IN THE [illegible]

Heavy Bookings

"The Perils of Pauline" is the biggest drawing-card we ever put out. The bookings are a record-breaker. We put on the market more prints of this great feature than most firms make of half a dozen put together. And we are prepared to put out more, so that every exhibitor will be assured of an early run. We can take care of you on every episode in good shape.

The Board of Censors

You wouldn't look for much enthusiasm from the Board of Censors, who have to look at all kinds of pictures from morning to night. When they were in the office looking over "The Perils of Pauline" their comments were wonderfully enthusiastic. One member said: "I hadn't paid much attention to this film, but I must find out where they can be seen, so I can take the children. They are the best pictures I have ever seen."

And there you are.

Another Big Eclectic Feature

THE HAND OF DESTINY

(4 PARTS)

This great four-part feature is an old story in a new dress. It tells the tale of a man falsely accused of a crime he did not commit. His wife and small daughter are left to shift as best they may. The son of the real criminal in the meantime lives on the fat of the land. Fate throws the son and daughter together finally. The son only knows that the girl is the daughter of a criminal and tries to bend her to his will. Not succeeding, he tries to have her fiancé throw her over by telling him of her father's disgrace. However, his father's partner in crime, to whom the girl has been kind, finally tells all and clears her father's name.

"The Hand of Destiny" is a strong film from beginning to end. It is clean, yet intensely dramatic. The situations are thrilling. Taken all round it is a wonderful feature.

SUCCESS FOR YOUR SHOW

is assured if your films are perfectly projected—and perfect projection is assured if your lens equipment is selected from

Bausch and Lomb Projection Lenses

There's nothing lost to your audience, out to the very edges of the picture, when the artistically acted film is told upon the screen by Bausch & Lomb objectives and condensers. Their flatness of field and brilliancy of image make them the perfect lens equipment for every purpose—from the shortest to the longest throw.

Our interesting free booklet is well worth writing for. It is of real value to owners and operators.

COOLING VENTILATION HEATING

"TYPHOON BLOW-IN SYSTEM" has revolutionized the ventilating problem. You get in front of a desk fan to keep cool, not in back. Apply this common sense and blow the air in.

Don't waste money experimenting with exhaust fans.

The TYPHOON MULTIBLADE BLOWER will force air right through ordinary exhaust fans. Reversed, the air can be exhausted as well.

Our Catalogue W tells how to keep cool in summer and warm in winter.

GREAT says the

MORNING TELEGRAPH:

Seldom, if ever, has a play been more artistically shown or more thoroughly appreciated. The scenes aroused the audience to "Ohs!" and "Ahs!" The acting was of the highest order. The theatre was packed and it looked more like the presentation of an important opera than the opening of a feature film.

WONDERFUL says the

DRAMATIC MIRROR:

A rare film with the most beautiful scenes ever shown in moving pictures. From every standpoint—scenic, dramatic and educational—it is wonderful.

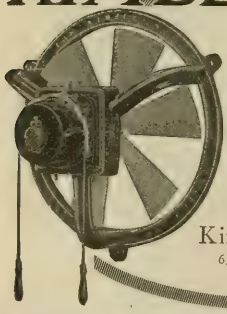
KIMBLE FANS



The only alternating current fan that reduces electric current consumption (and consequently ventilating cost) in direct proportion to every speed reduction. Run it at ½ speed for a small "house" and it uses up only ¼ as much current as when you run it full speed for a packed house. Kimble Ventilation is the most economical—also the most efficient. Write for the Red Catalog and get the facts.

The Majestic Motion Picture Co.

is now also supervising the production of

MAJESTIC RELEASES

D. W. GRIFFITH'S ACHIEVEMENTS

As producer of many of the best known and most successful photoplays of the past five years, Mr. Griffith is credited with having originated the principal rules of technique now followed by all producers, including the switchback, the closeup, the fadeout, repose and sustained suspense.

D. W. GRIFFITH

D. W. GRIFFITH'S SUCCESSES

The following recent great successes were produced by Mr. Griffith: "Judith of Bethulia," "The Massacre," "The Battle of Elderbush Gulch," and "Brute Force."

"Griffith" features which he has produced since joining the Mutual program are:

The Escape	7 Reels
The Battle of the Sexes	5 Reels
Home Sweet Home	6 Reels

Majestic Pictures are not "the best in the world", but we expect to make them as good as any.

With this end in view and for his own special "Griffith productions," Mr. Griffith has associated with him some of the very best talent and brains that the motion picture art and industry afford. The players in the new Majestic films are not necessarily actors and actresses with inflated stage reputations, who, no longer able to impose upon the public before the footlights, are now attempting to bring their worn out ideas and obsolete, stilted, unnatural "stagecraft" into the rich field of motion pictures. Not from this class has Mr. Griffith chosen his players, but from those who have proven themselves on the screen students of true expression, striving always "to hold, as 'twere, the mirror up to nature."

In every department of Majestic motion picture making, from the camera to the final cutting and assembling of the film, from the first writing of the story to the final editing and titling, Mr. Griffith has with him, and will continue to have, the experienced assistance of people who for years have labored along with him as associates or contemporaries, to help develop this great art—the greatest in educational and amusement value the world has ever known.

It is the hope of Mr. Griffith and his staff to continue on in further endeavor to reach a higher level in the photodrama art, with the aid of those actors and directors in other companies, as well as the motion picture press, with its criticisms and encouragement, who have, from the beginning, joined in the long, hard battle for higher ideals.

Selig

"The Baby Spy"

"THE BABY SPY"

"Baby" Lillian Wade shows a sixth sense for absorbing war secrets that, daringly conveyed over the border by her resourceful mother, saves a Union Army corps. An unusual and winsome war play.

IN TWO REELS—MAY 25TH

May 26th—"The Clock Went Wrong"

A lazy man disobeys his alarm clock and comes to grief, but reforms in time.

On the same reel with

"Simp Simpson and the Spirits"

Occultism does not agree with a husky ranchman. Fun for fair.

May 27th—"Dawn"

A mountain hermit adopts a waif, who in after years finds out she has a wealthy father. But she prefers her modest mountain home to a palace in a big city.

May 29th—"Second Childhood"

Gray-beards, discussing their boyhood days, conclude to try out the old tricks, and the community is greatly alarmed over their pranks. A fine "Funny Friday."

Michael Strogoff

A Five Reel Feature With

JACOB P. ADLER

(Note the Jacob P. — this is the great Adler)

THE PLAYERS

Jacob P. Adler, one of America's foremost romantic actors, plays the title role. He is supported by a cast embracing the best known of the popular Lubin players—actors and actresses who are established stars in the firmament of the photo-play. This is the first time that a great actor of the speaking stage has been surrounded by a cast of real motion picture stars. The combination is a most valuable one.

THE THRILLS

Spectacular scenes abound in this picture, each of them big enough to carry an ordinary feature. They have been staged absolutely without regard for expense and bring into full play the Lubin Company's enormous producing facilities.

SEE The burning of Moscow. The river ablaze as the fugitives try to escape on a raft.
The blinding of Michael Strogoff.
The burning of Irkutsk.
Bohara, the big Tartar camp.
The big court and palace scenes.

THE STORY

Michael Strogoff, "the courier of the Czar," is the central figure in one of the most famous, virile and fascinating romances ever written. It is a story especially fitted for motion picture production and its full worth is well realized.

A SCIENTIFICALLY CONSTRUCTED CONDENSING LENS!!

The advent of the Kleine White Label Condenser has caused a sensation.

No longer need you fuss with condensers moulded from ordinary glass.

Kleine White Label Condensers are ground from the highest grade optical glass — they are guaranteed not to discolor — no light is lost!

Cheap condensers turn all colors of the rainbow and absorb an unnecessary quantity of the good light you pay for. Why run up "Juice" bills—accuse high salaried operators of incompetency—fuss with lenses—and then through an indifferently good or a genuinely poor picture, all because a condenser isn't doing its duty!

Use the Kleine White Label Condenser—the condenser that never turns color — and you will obtain a clearly defined spot with a brilliant white light.

PRICES: 4½ inch Diameter, 6½, 7½, 8½, 9½, 10½ inch Focus $1.25

Kalem Masterpiece Films

The Great Historical Film

Wolfe, or The Conquest of Quebec

A Five-Part Feature Produced in Authentic Locations in Canada

In his review on this feature, W. Stephen Bush wrote: "For over an hour I sat enthralled by the spectacle of seeing history literally repeating itself on the screen. The task has been done with unqualified success. * * * The scaling of the heights to the Plains of Abraham, however, was one of the strongest scenes in this picture. The marvelous feat is acted over in the most realistic manner conceivable. * * * There is no flaw that I was able to detect."

Francis Marion "The Swamp Fox"

A Three-Part Story of the War of '76

His rescue of General Gates from the British camp and his dashing escapades during the war of 1776 are shown with wonderful realism. Guy Coombs and Marguerite Courtot in leading roles.

The Death Sign at High Noon

A Western Drama in Three Parts

A classic of the West. The Indians' attack upon the settlement and a minister's superb sacrifice to save his flock make this of absorbing interest.

A Celebrated Case

A Four-Part Adaptation of the Famous Drama

The awful combat between the French and English armies at Fontenoy is one of the scenes in this great adaptation of the famous old drama. Alice Joyce, Guy Coombs, Marguerite Courtot and Alice Hollister in strong roles.

The Other Half of the Note

Cleek's seventh case takes him aboard ship in pursuit of diamond smugglers. He works in disguise, completely fooling not only the man he is watching but the customs officials as well. Cleek does some extremely clever work and nabs the criminals after they have successfully outwitted the customs inspectors.

Facts and Comments

OUR friends and readers may be very sure that the vagaries of censorship will bother us in many ways for many a day to come. We have only tasted slightly of the bitter fruit ripened partly by fanatical agitation and partly by our own neglect. Out in Oregon a censor board composed in the main of women has forced an exhibitor into the police court on a charge of having exhibited a picture without the gracious permission of the censors. This picture had been passed by the inofficial National Board, but the Oregon officials, consisting of three women and two men, thought otherwise, and when the manager of the theater ignored them and showed the picture without their consent, he had to stand trial in the court.

We certainly do admire the splendid courage of conviction displayed by our exhibitor. He might have compromised and he might have followed the popular line of least resistance. He preferred to fight it out, placing principle above the advantages of trimming and temporizing. His trial lasted one entire day, and was remarkable for its bitterness. The jury deliberated for fifteen minutes (evidently a mere matter of courtesy) and then brought in a verdict of "Not Guilty." Can you ask for a finer demonstration of the fact that censorship places the exhibitor at the mercy of irresponsible and narrow-minded cranks? In this particular case the exhibitor won out after much loss of time and a good deal of expense. Can we expect every exhibitor to lose his time and money in an effort to resist unjust censorship? We always thought and still think that here was one of the life purposes of exhibitors' organizations. Here it seemed to us was the golden opportunity for brotherly co-operation among exhibitors. Instead of the unit front against a common enemy we find groups of organized exhibitors apparently determined to impose the yoke of censorship on their own necks and on the necks of their brethren.

We certainly have no desire to add to the perplexities of our Fifth Avenue Board of Censorship, but it is pretty hard to understand their attitude on one of the most disgusting of the white slave films now running unmolested by the police in a New York theater which is trying hard to lose its reputation as a decent place of entertainment. The film as it came from the hands of its perpetrator was too filthy and suggestive for any normal person, and the Fifth Avenue censors ordered five changes, such as "reduce to a flash the death of the father" and "eliminate the contemptuous look of triumph on the face of a procurer in a Chinese restaurant scene." This, it seems to us, is trifling with a serious evil. You cannot cure a cancer by painting part of the diseased surface, nor can a barrel filled with garbage be made fit for the dining-room by putting a few drops of rose-water on it. Our friends and neighbors ought to know that the white slave films have been the cause of a hundred black eyes to the motion picture in every part of the country. Decent producers and decent exhibitors have suffered not a little through the exhibition of these vulgar and nauseating films. We know at first that much of the agitation for official censorship is directly traceable to the white slave film. Do the Fifth Avenue censors really believe that sanitation cannot be learned except through the study of sewers and dumping grounds? These same censors sometimes strain at gnats in the cases of reputable producers and read an offence into a film where none exists and none was intended. The Board now enjoys an uncommon measure of public confidence, but a few more decisions like this approval of a white slave production will go a good way toward impairing this confidence.

THE temptation to say something disparaging about the products of their neighbors and competitors seems irresistible to some advertisers, especially those who have had little advertising experience. Among many pages of sensible and dignified advertising the reader finds an occasional amount of space devoted to belittling the other fellow. Deploring the habit of exaggeration in his nearest competitor, the newcomer bursts into a fervid eulogy of his own wares. The latter is all right, but the former is wholly unnecessary. There is such a thing as "deportment" in advertising. A well-known road to wealth is the minding of one's own business. The object of all advertising is to present the merits of the thing advertised intelligently and in a businesslike manner. All reference to the fearful inferiority of your competitor is in bad taste. Your advertisement must eventually win by the intrinsic merits of your product. Simple facts, to be sure, but not always borne in mind by the gentlemen to whom the delicate task of advertising is entrusted.

The Exhibitor and the Public.

By W. Stephen Bush

THE exhibitor of motion pictures is an important factor in the life of every community whether rural or urban. The motion picture theater has become a sort of social center. There is nothing in history quite comparable to the place which the motion picture theater fills in our civilization. It has a more intimate touch than the conventional stage: it is far closer to the daily lives of the people. It is by all odds the best-frequented library in the world.

Have the exhibitors grown larger with their increased opportunities and responsibilities? Have they measured up to the many new tasks which the modern theater has imposed upon them? There is no doubt that they have. One of the many marvelous things in the field of motion pictures is the growth of the exhibitor.

The almost incredible improvements in the methods of presentation which have made the motion picture house the rival of the best legitimate theaters, are largely due to the exhibitor. The new quality of multiple-reel features have been suitably treated by the exhibitors. Very many of the exhibitors are experts in the matter of projection, and all of them have a working knowledge of this most important matter in presentation. I do not have to mention the giant strides exhibitors have made in the matter of music. Progress here has been greater in the last twelvemonth than in all the years before. The fearful habit of "playing to the pictures" in the style of the old-fashioned trap-drummer has almost disappeared, and instances where the orchestra stops at the most tense moments of the play to allow the leader to refresh himself with a new supply of chewing tobacco are extremely rare.

In other words, with the new style of dramatic kinematography there has grown up a new school of exhibitors. Indeed, one may say that the nucleus at least of a new school of exhibitors was ready before the supply of big features was very large. It happened quite often that the new school exhibitor had to search high and low for a picture to give him the opportunities he longed for. Of this new school of exhibitors I propose to speak at some length in the near future.

What I want to emphasize is the character which the office of an exhibitor of motion pictures has assumed to-day. It is true that the exhibitor is and ought to be primarily a showman catering to the entertainment of his public. The modern exhibitor, however, is far more than that. Let me give a few illustrations of my meaning. The great forces which to-day are working for the good of mankind are coming after the exhibitor to enlist his aid. Take for example the present splendid movement of the "Safety First" Society. This society, whose motives are entirely unselfish and philanthropic, is trying to save human lives and limbs. The motto of the various agencies engaged in transportation seems in the past to have been "Speed First." Safety had only an incidental and minor place on their program. The result was an appaling loss of life in the crowded cities. In the teeming quarters of the poorer classes especially, the toll taken by the reckless driver was frightfully heavy. Trucks and autos rushed through streets crowded with children whom the natural instinct to play had driven into the open, and who had no playgrounds but the streets. How many little lives have been crushed out and how many straight limbs have been crippled through ill-regulated traffic is beyond calculation. The idea of stopping this waste of life by a campaign of prevention based on education was conceived by several public-spirited citizens. A great mass of literature was prepared and distributed, and no doubt much good was accomplished. The promoters of the campaign found, however, that there was no way of reaching the public half as effective as the screen of the motion picture theater. Through the screen they would reach all the public, and reach it directly and certainly. You may skip a page in a newspaper, you may glance at the big type on a pamphlet or folder and then throw it away, but you cannot escape the screen. Consequently the founders and officers of the "Safety First" Society put themselves in communication with the exhibitors, and the exhibitors, quick to see their opportunity and their responsibility, came forward and gave their help freely and enthusiastically. I can say from my own observation that the day after they were requested to aid, the exhibitors in this city had the slides of the "Safety First" Society faithfully working between reels. The space which the cigarette makers could not buy at any price and which few exhibitors sell at any price for any advertisement, was placed at the disposal of this philanthropic movement.

Again, a clean-up week is announced by the Department of Health. The success or failure of such a week depends entirely upon the degree of interest and enthusiasm which can be aroused on behalf of the campaign. Once the enthusiasm is kindled, it spreads, and, as a famous writer put it, "there is nothing grander than the contagion of good health." The Department of Health in this city has made a most urgent appeal to the exhibitors to assist in the work of education. The exhibitors respond to every request with a hearty good will.

It is difficult to overestimate the power as well as the responsibility which the use of the screen gives to the exhibitor. It places him in a peculiar relation to the public. It lays upon him the duty of "editing" his screen, and it must be confessed that no editor in the country has discharged this duty better than the exhibitor. There are important communities everywhere in which the exhibitor of the motion picture theater is one of the telling forces for promoting adult education and objects of a public social character generally. In this respect, the small exhibitor is just as useful to the community as his brother and colleague with the larger seating capacity. The writer personally knows of more than one rural community which has been improved mentally and morally by a clean motion picture entertainment. The amount of prejudice that has been eradicated by the exhibitor who takes the public in his confidence and seeks friends and allies among the best classes of his town or village, is incalculable. More than ever before in the history of motion pictures does the exhibitor of to-day enjoy the confidence of his public. It has not come to him by chance. He has labored to deserve it.

A recent remarkable instance of the exhibitor's power was demonstrated when a few weeks ago it seemed as if we must go to war with Mexico. Everywhere in the motion picture theaters slides of the Stars and Stripes were shown, and a tidal wave of patriotism was seen to roll from coast to coast. No one has a better chance of feeling the pulse of the public than the exhibitor.

We expect much from the screen in educating the public on the subject of censorship. The field for an active campaign of enlightenment is very great indeed. Eventually public opinion will finish all the fallacies of censorship. It depends on us to help in the creating of a sound public opinion. The slide and the screen will be our best aids.

Glorifying the Trivial.

By Louis Reeves Harrison

NOW that every play over one reel long is a "pronounced success," according to those who keep dramatic criticism clean, valuable, useful, interesting and above venality; now that enconiums and panegyrics may be had at half rates for the summer season, it might be announced that evolution in making screen plays is a thing of the past—that the ultimate has been reached—if common, ordinary people in the audience were not inclined to make slurring remarks.

A lady who greatly enjoyed Miss Pickford's performance in "Tess of the Storm Country," asked me a question which I could not answer. "Why should a mother of wealth, who entrusts her new-born babe to the mercies of a penniless girl, leave no money to keep the child from starving to death?" I am sure I don't know. It would almost seem that a scenario writer should not depart from natural human impulses quite so far in order to work up a situation, when it was an easy matter to give the effect of reality. A mother who would make no provision for the child she has brought into the world, while she was able to do so and near enough to afford assistance, is a conception having only one commendable quality,—its novelty. Mothers who complacently permit helpless babes to starve under their very eyes are, most fortunately for the human race, as rare as scenarios with a punch.

Miss Pickford's characterization, barring her exaggerated costume, was a source of constant delight to the audience. As an artist of the first rank, she glorified the trivial, for all that she did with vigor and intelligence was made possible by a situation far removed from the probable. And so it is that other interpreters of vigor and intelligence, and directors, too, of high ability are called upon to deck a lot of disjointed skeleton librettos with beauty and charm, if one may believe what one hears among the "anxious inquirers" in the front. I am not making up a story to illustrate a point in this article. I can get along very well by citing actual comments by members of the audience.

"Why," asked a man after seeing a big play at "The Strand," "should the heiress marry the brother she did not like in order to save his mother's house, when she could have done the same thing by marrying the brother she loved,—the one who loved her?" "Why," he continued, "could she not lend enough money to pay the house debts without marrying at all?" "Why didn't one of the brothers pay those debts—they had enough to gamble away thousands and back sporting events for tens of thousands?" I am sure I don't know, unless it is that heiresses in moving pictures are always bartering their souls and bodies to keep someone's gold paint from becoming tarnished.

One might as well ask why screen heroines do not show some of the common-sense that would ordinarily engage human interest, and mothers those qualities calculated to quicken human sympathy. I have cited two instances which happened to come under immediate attention, but any picture fan who listens to what is remarked in his immediate neighborhood will be astounded by the insistence upon truth of atmosphere and detail. I believe in listening to the voice of any audience or of any member of an audience. That opinion is one of the real tests of a photoplay's consistency of form or treatment.

Members of an audience are not always able to state definitely what jars them in a screen production. Most of them are well-wishers, if they are not ardent supporters of the picture shows, and they are not only inclined to be fair, but generous and very tolerant. I think so highly of their massed opinion that I wish I could note the effect of each photodrama on a crowd rather than prejudge that effect. They may not point out a weak spot in construction, but they know it is there as well as the best critic in the land, and quite as clearly as they recognize attempted glorification of the trivial, they perceive, in this form of public amusement, possibilities, artistic and educational, of the highest kind.

There is little fault to find with the many splendid interpreters of photodrama—actors and actresses of attractive personality are now abundant. Directors of the better class have become so accomplished that they embellish as well as emphasize important phases of a screen story, improve on the original, as a rule. Critics are becoming generous to the verge of indiscrimination. The lack seems to be in authors of ability and in a disposition on the part of producers to accord such authors adequate compensation.

People who go to the picture show also read the papers and the magazines. They are accustomed to the stimulation of literature and aware of its significance as an interpreter of what is interesting in human experience. They turn aside from daily work for the same kind of refreshment at the picture show as that afforded by printed stories, whether fictional or instructive, whether a presentation of actual facts in entertaining form, or a diverting romance, their idea never being that of looking at some meaningless triviality, however attractively portrayed, a play without an idea, a watch without a spring.

Generous critics,—most of them are tender-hearted—cover this absence of a mainspring by praising the works. How beautifully intricate are the full-jeweled wheels! How admirable the photography and the acting and the settings! There is no doubt about the value of structural perfection, so the reviewer may skillfully avoid mentioning the subject matter, the real character and contents of a play, by dwelling upon the phenomena of form. A critic can be very well occupied in determining whether the subject matter is logically arranged and presented in such a way as to command attention. Not so with the audience.

People in front unconsciously approve of whatever makes it easy for them to seize the meaning of a photodrama, but it is not for them to consider the succession in which subjects and thoughts should be presented. It is the meaning they enjoy if it stirs their emotions—it is the thought they enjoy if it is something new, or splendid, or inspiring. The manager of "The Strand" wants plays that leave an impression on an audience, so that patrons will come back again and keep on coming back for more. So does any live manager. It is all right for a screen story to spar cleverly, but it must have a punch to win.

Writing stories for screen presentation can never be successfully done by people unequipped for the work with knowledge and judgment, and even authors of knowledge and judgment must find time and energy sufficient to do their work well. It is not a trivial occupation, yet certain periodicals permit fakirs to advertise that the art can be taught by correspondence, "no other knowledge or training necessary." The purpose of moving-picture production is not to publish the ignorance of the incompetent, but it is to give people the best creative genius has to offer. The screen presentation is simply a means of expression more direct and forceful than words—it is not a medium for the fakir or the fool—of all things, its purpose is not to glorify the trivial.

A PHOTODRAMA of beautiful motive, of exquisite treatment, and of exposition imbued with the personality of brilliant Griffith, "Home, Sweet Home," ranks among the highest screen productions—"masterpiece" has been so indiscriminately used that it has lost all dignity, if not significance. One does not have to state that there is a "beautiful motive" and leave it to the imagination. The immortal works of man make him akin to God, partaking of and participating in the divine purpose so far as the world is concerned. The splendid motive is sounded in the biographical sketch of Payne, as idealized by Griffith, and leading up to the composition of the imperishable song:

"It is something too strange to understand,
How all the chords on the instrument,
Whether sorrowful, blithe, or grand,
Under the touch of your master hand
Were into one melody blent."

"And now, though I live for a thousand years,
On no new chord can a new hand fall.
The chords of sorrow, of pain, of tears,
The chords of raptures and hopes and fears,
I say you have struck them all;
And all the meaning put into each strain
By the Great Composer, you have made plain."

The poem of Miss Wilcox seems so appropriate that it might have been written of Payne and his imperishable song, and it is, like the photoplay, an appreciation of genius by genius, though offered in general rather than individual tribute. Mr. Griffith portrays Payne in the natural and sympathetic character of man, as we know him, mortal in his weaknesses, divine only in an occasional expression of all that is fine in his personality. The composer's story is that of a man who wandered away from his home and from the sweet, true-hearted girl to whom he was engaged, to end his days in foreign lands, after yielding quite as much to vagrant impulses as to noble inspirations.

He broke his mother's heart—she deemed him an unworthy son—and the girl who waited for him on earth died, constant in her love to the erring man of her choice. He was only a man, and the nearer our hearts for all that. In extenuation, he created what has come down to us through uncounted sources, that will go on in the countless centuries to come, softening other hearts as it has sweetened ours.

From the moment that the biography starts with the raising of a window upon the domestic life of Payne and his mother, to the pathetic end of this part of the play, the vast audience at "The Strand" sat spellbound. The dramaturgic skill of the director, enabling him to utilize the histrionic skill of the actors, brought out an enthralling performance, the honors going to Harry Walthall as Payne, and Lillian Gish as his sweetheart, with some dainty touches by Dorothy Gish.

The first episode offered a delightful comedy relief and gave opportunity to one of the best comediennes ever seen in photodrama, Mae Marsh as "Apple Pie Mary." She fascinated the audience as completely as if she had been before them in person, the thousands present laughing at her delicately-conveyed mental processes. She has the art of picturing thought to a degree that argues her own intensity and intelligent grasp of all she is required to convey, going even beyond that into spontaneous delineations of her own.

Henry Walthall, Lillian Gish and Mrs. Crowell in "Home, Sweet Home" (Reliance).

The story of "Apple Pie Mary" is an illustration of the power exerted by the song, "Home, Sweet Home." So also is the episode in which James Kirkwood and Donald Crisp do some forceful acting, as two brothers of lifetime hatred, driving their mother insane by a double tragedy, from which condition she is restored to the remaining child by the song

Courtney Foote and Blanche Sweet in the second episode.

So also is the third episode, in which three stars of the first magnitude, Blanche Sweet, Owen Moore and Courtney Foote, present a version of the indispensable triangle, one with a happy termination through the all-pervading influence of one man's contribution to human enlightenment.

The allegory is a spiritual phrase of great beauty, and a fitting termination to what will undoubtedly be an enduring work. The spirit of the whole play, as well as its theme and treatment, is so imaginative and artistic, while appealing to the purest sensibilities, that "poetic drama" seems to designate the production. This is meant in high praise. Drama of noble purpose that is poetic in spirit and artistic in presentation, tends to make life lovely and wonderful, to give it that stimulus which leads to progress. "Home, Sweet Home" is an enchantment of the screen.

And nothing that ever was born or evolved,
Nothing created by light or force,
But deep in its system there lies dissolved
A shining drop from the Great Love Source;
A shining drop that shall live for aye——
Though kingdoms may perish and stars decay."

Strong Climax in "The White Lie."

Three-Reel Feature Provides Splendid Opportunities for Regina Badet and Mark Gerard.

Reviewed by Randall M. White.

REGINA BADET is featured in "The White Lie," a three-reel release which was added to the Box Office Attractions' feature program, Saturday, May 16. Working in almost every scene and carrying the burden of the strong dramatic story, Miss Badet is perhaps entitled to the honor which is bestowed upon her in the advance billing and yet, many who watch with a critical eye the unfolding of the plot will take away with them a more lasting impression of the superb acting done by Mark Gerard in a role which may be described as a "heroic heavy."

"The White Lie" is a story of the underworld with a climax which has evidently been suggested by the old adage, "When rogues fall out honest men get their dues." Briefly, it runs this way. The wife of a rough thief leaves her husband after she has stood unspeakable abuse and later marries a nobleman whom she has served in the capacity of nurse, after having been led to believe that her disreputable husband has been killed. Through having "double crossed" him, the husband has aroused the undying enmity of a fellow crook who is secretly in love with the wife of the story. The husband crook has not been killed, but returns to blackmail his wife of other days, now the wife of the nobleman. Forced to deal with him, the wife agrees to give him a valuable necklace in exchange for a letter which would lay bare her past. The night the husband, arch crook, calls for the letter by appointment happens to be the night which his one-time associate, who is looking for revenge, has chosen to burglarize the nobleman's house without realizing that the nobleman's wife is the girl whom he has secretly loved. The burglar gets there first and has the necklace in his possession when the blackmailing husband arrives and forces him to scurry into an adjoining room. From this point of vantage the burglar sees the blackmailer once more abuse the woman whom he has in his power. A pistol in the hands of the burglar ends the blackmailer's life and as the sentimental crook makes his getaway he leaves the smoking gun in the woman's hand after having transferred the necklace to the person of the dead man, permitting the "white lie" of the title to arise when the impression is created that the wife has shot in defense of her property when she discovered a burglar about to despoil her of her jewels.

The climax of the picture is gripping in the extreme and stands up well, because it has been led up to by a sequence of events in which there are few if any inconsistencies.

Mr. Gerard, who appears as "The Eel," sentimental crook, does his most admirable work in a "solo scene" where his facial expressions indicate his horrible hatred of the man who has wronged him and is once more annoying the woman he loves.

The picture is brimful of lively action, the scenic settings have been admirably selected and the photography is first class. Worthy of especial mention is the setting which has been chosen for the intense scene which results when the blackmailing husband confronts the wife of the nobleman to shatter her dream of present and continued happiness. Mammoth rocks with the turbulent sea suggested just behind them, provide splendid backgrounds for the tense action which the camera is called upon to record.

WITH such a cast, every performer a star, and such a director, something of a star himself, almost any fairly good story is bound to be a success, and this one, of comprehensive title, "The Shadow of the Past," is no exception. It is highly interesting at times, and it is remarkable for a beautiful restaurant ensemble and a realistic collision between a train and a motor car. But, after all, the interpretation must be given foremost rank. It is without flaw, Miss Stewart, Miss Tapley, Miss Gordon, Lytton, Morey and Lincoln responding in full to their opportunities.

It was my pleasure to highly compliment Miss Bertsch when she was first winning her laurels, and it was a pleasure to note her undoubted talent as a scenario writer, but it appears to me that the purpose of "The Shadow of the Past" is very much submerged, whereas there existed in it a significance which would have greatly enhanced the play's power, its effect and its value. "The supreme goal of the great literature of our era," says an illustrious critic, "has been and remains the expression, in some form of final artistic denotement, of the struggle of the ego at self-realization."

There is a lot of active charity in a photoplay of humanizing tendency, one picturing man in his struggle to rise above hereditary impulse and break from the restraints of artificial environment. Here are three people, Brandon, his wife and Antoinette released from prison, into which they were tricked by a scheming politician, three people of criminal records about to begin straight lives. It is too easy for human credulity. One falls into a position which enables him to wear immaculate dress suits, and the girl becomes secretary to a gubernatorial candidate, not only without an effort, but with an income that enables her to dress in elaborate evening gowns. It is not shown that they made any effort to attain their positions of trust, so we are left to presume that they are individuals of extraordinary intelligence.

For three people to leave jail and effect such a remarkable transformation in jig time, forces us to presume their intelligence, yet, when the suave villain appears with a scheme to disgrace the young candidate for Governor, they do not go to him reluctantly, to play a part in a frame-up to ruin him politically. This is scarcely a commendable form of self-realization for people who have won the confidence and good will of their employers. Brandon and his wife do nothing to save the intended victim; to the contrary, they play their ignoble roles to the last. The girl's escape is largely due, as is the death of the villain and his confederate, to circumstances, and her final good intentions constitute the story's only redeeming motive.

All this is beautifully executed by Director Ince and afforded dignity of interpretation by the several stars of the first magnitude who participate, but the big punch of Miss Bertsch's story is not delivered. It is only a little love-pat of the "God-bless-you-my-children" kind, so that the happy ending does not come as a relief, but as a matter of course. Perhaps it is not her fault at all—in which case I beg pardon—but the situations are too forced—we cannot be stirred by any human story whose premises are well-nigh inconceivable.

I would write this review without a line of suggestive criticism if I did not feel sure it will be received in the spirit with which it is offered. The steady evolution of Vitagraph photodramas has resulted from a broad-minded attitude toward intelligent criticism, and I feel sure that Miss Bertsch partakes of that spirit. I might as well, at the same time, pay my respects to Mr. Ince for permitting so much action of importance to occur with others listening, yet unobserved, in the same room. After which I will put the hammer away in the kitchen drawer.

The big ensemble, portraying a fashionable restaurant in full blast from a point of view of an elevated platform, is a magnificent setting, one of great artistic beauty, and some of the other scenes are delightful. The clash between a train and an automobile on a grade crossing is done with ingenuity of a high order, and there is everywhere observable a craftsmanship in delineation that has a value not to be gain-said.

British Notes.

(Special Correspondence to THE WORLD.)

ONE of the directors of the London Missionary Society has recently been making some interesting observations upon the introduction of the moving picture to the natives of the South Sea Islands. Exhibitions there, he says, are being given twice nightly and are well patronized. Wild West pictures depicting shooting and lynchings have exercised such a demoralizing effect upon the native patrons that the South Sea Islands Council are contemplating appointing a censor.

The employee of the moving picture theater has been seized upon by a London labor paper as the subject for the sympathy of the nation in the question of wages and hours. If the journal's appeals are successful we shall probably have a trade union exclusively for persons employed at moving picture exhibitions before the world is much older.

The authorities at Sunderland, the populous shipbuilding town in the north of England certainly appear to be carrying their notions of censorship a trifle too far. The most recent addition to the stringent regulations governing the "movies" there is the poster censorship. Before exhibitors may display posters to advertise their films they must now submit specimens of each kind for the sanction of the chief constable.

The "Universal" Company is shortly to launch an extensive advertising campaign of the series of releases dealing with the adventures of Lucille Love. A prominent newspaper has agreed to run the story in serial form with each release, while Miss Love herself is expected in England shortly to take part personally in the "great boost."

Sir Hubert von Herkomer, R. A., played his last character part in an eighteenth century drama filmed at Baskey, near London, entitled, "A Highwayman's Honor." The U. S. A. rights of this production have been bought by the Mecca Feature Film Company, of New York, but several other notable Herkomer productions are yet for sale as exclusives in the American market.

"Sheltering an Ingrate" (American)

Reviewed by James S. McQuade.

SHELTERING AN INGRATE is a one-reel western subject with a good story and full of action. It is out of the ordinary run of such photodramas as they are produced today, for, if I remember rightly, there is not a single pistol drawn or seen while the story lasts. There is a bad man in it to whom the story owes its title, and he prefers the use of the bludgeon to that of firearms, because he is a sneaky villain with a yellow streak.

A haven of rest scene from "Sheltering an Ingrate" (American).

Thomas Ricketts, the producer of this American reel, who is now trying his hand on western subjects, shows his old-time painstaking in matters of detail. He gives us several fine exterior scenes showing life as it is lived on a big ranch by the owner, his family, his foreman, and a band of cowboys. A cowboy hippodrome scene is most realistically shown, and the exciting horse race between the foreman and the ingrate is as exciting as if one were on the very spot.

The Arrest in "Sheltering an Ingrate" (American).

The cast is a strong one, including Ed. Coxen, Miss Winifred Greenwood, and George Field. Several fine displays of horsemanship are given by Messrs. Coxen and Field, and many of the supernumeraries are evidently real cowboys, who spend most of their time in the saddle. These latter are seen roping steers, riding bucking bronchos and branding cattle, etc.

The opening scene shows the escape of a convict from an eastern prison. Longwood is his real name and he makes his way west to a rancher's camp, where he is given a chance by the big-hearted rancher. Ray Howe, the foreman, takes the part of the new man when he is made the victim of cowboy pranks. On one of these occasions Longwood strikes one of his tormentors with a stake and fells him from the rear. The injured man's companions rush to inflict punishment, but Ray saves the new hand from their wrath.

Longwood has a fascinating manner with women, and it turns out that he attracts the fancy of Nona, the only daughter of the rancher, who has always been looked upon as Ray's sweetheart. Like a slinking fox he holds trysts by stealth, and is discovered several times by Ray, who cannot bring himself to the belief that Nona has forsaken him. The girl finally shows her preference for the attentions of the ingrate, and Ray nurses his sorrow.

The day of the great cowboy hippodrome, in a nearby town, arrives and a great crowd assembles on the fair grounds race track. Every cowboy is bent on winning the prize in a speed contest, for the girls from far and near are looking on. Ray and Longwood pass the judges' stand, nose and nose, in a dead heat. During the interval that elapsed before the men again tested their skill and the speed of their mounts, Longwood stealthily cut the stirrup strap of Ray's saddle almost through. But a boy standing near saw Longwood beside the horse, and recalled the incident at a critical time.

During the race, when his mount is going at a tremendous pace, Ray is thrown, and lies unconscious. Meanwhile his opponent wins the race and receives the prize—a fine saddle. Friends of Ray examine his saddle and find the evidence of foul play. Then the boy tells them what he had seen. Longwood is confronted by the witness and, being found guilty, is ordered from the camp. Just then a stranger, who has been in the vicinity for some time, steps up and arrests him as an escaped convict.

Nona is humiliated at her lack of judgment and her old love for Ray returns. As the story fades we see Ray, who is convalescent, taking her in his arms. The release date is May 27.

Miss Betty Harte

MISS BETTY HARTE is well known to picturegoers. For a long time she was with the Selig Western company, playing opposite Hobart Bosworth in many pictures. Afterward she was with Edison in the West. She has recently appeared in a couple of Famous Players' productions, the latter of which was as Effie Deans in "A Woman's Triumph," an adaptation of "The Heart of Midlothian." Her work in this was especially strong.

Betty Harte.

Just now Miss Harte is down in Bermuda, where under the direction of James Gordon she is being featured in a number of unusual water pictures for the Victory Company. In a four-reel subject which Mr. Gordon has just finished it devolved upon Miss Harte to dive down into the ocean. Without hesitation she did as she was directed; she never was known as a quitter. While under water she was bitten by what is described as an angel fish. (How this particular fish was identified is not stated, but it makes a good story, anyway.) Miss Harte rapidly recovered from the effects of the attack of the fish who belied his name or her name, as her friends will be glad to know. It is said the Victory Company intends remaining on the island until the locations are exhausted, which will mean for some time to come. Among the members of the company besides Miss Harte and Mr. Gordon are Mr. and Mrs. A. E. Turner, Alfred Sidwell, C. J. Rosher, William Saling, Herbert Smith and George Tucker. One of the subjects to be made before the company returns to New York is an unusually large military picture.

"A Mother of Men"

Fine Three-Part Warner's Features Subject Produced by Sid Olcott—Good Work by Miss Grant.

Review by George Blaisdell.

HERE is a story of Civil War days along new lines. It is of a family divided—but it is divided in sorrow, not in anger. The father in the uniform of the South and a son in the uniform of the North bid good-bye to the weeping wife and mother. The two men ride down the picturesque road fringed with moss-hung trees; at the point of parting the son falls on the neck of his father—but his grief does not overcome his deeply-rooted conviction. "A Mother of Men" is a story which will cause no measure of irritation on either side of the fast fading as it was more than imaginary Mason and Dixon line.

Valentine Grant.

The picture marks the debut of Miss Valentine Grant. While it is the second time she will have been seen on the screen, it is really the initial subject in which she worked. Miss Grant in her opening scene is shown as an old woman seated on a bench in a bleak and wintry Central Park. A policeman escorts her to the Night Court, where she is arraigned on a charge of vagrancy. The sympathetic judge questions her. The scene fades into the story of her life; the transition is to a typical plantation of the sunny and ante-bellum South. Miss Grant is shown as a charming bride. This new screen star, for it would be unfair to denominate her by a lesser rank, displays the qualities that make for success in emotional portrayal. She has poise, naturalness in situations of gayety and of stress—and in a player the secondary but no means negligible attribute of good looks.

The work of the cast is excellent. Arthur Donaldson is strong in the role of the husband and father who chooses to fight by the side of his neighbors. James Vincent is the son who joins the Northern army. Walter Chapin is the son who remains with his mother up to the time his father's body is brought home, when he takes up the parental sword. Roy Sheldon is a general and at another part of the play a confidential and faithful family servitor.

Scene from "A Mother of Men" (Warner's).

The picture is staged in luxuriant Florida. The photography is of the best. On the dramatic side there are in this smoothly told story many situations that will stir. On the sensational or spectacular side there are well-staged battles in which many men are engaged. The views of strife are short and snappy; they supplement the main action, but never subordinate it. Some of the more striking scenes are the serenade of the parents and three young sons by the slaves; the cutting on the wrist of the youngest son by a rebellious negro, and the later kidnapping of the little fellow; the declaration by father and son of their respective political beliefs and the departure for the war; the death of the father and the grief of the son as he kneels by the body; the interjected views of the mother at home, always awaiting; the departure of the second son and his selection to do the work of a spy; his later detention in the Northern camp to determine if he is entitled to wear the blue; his dramatic overpowering of his guard and novel escape; the torch-lighted pursuit through the palmetto grove and seeking of refuge in his own home, followed by men in command of his brother, who is ignorant of the fugitive's identity; the exchange of fatal shots between the two; the grief of the mother and her departure in search of the son kidnapped in childhood; and the fading back to the sombre Night Court, where the gray-bearded judge scans the face of the trembling old woman beside him and then slowly turns back his coat-sleeve and reveals the scar—and the reunion of mother and son.

Mr. Olcott has done well, both as producer and in his portrayal, brief but nevertheless effective, of the judge. "A Mother of Men" is a story that will hold and move, too.

"THE NATION-WIDE DEMAND."

In response to an alleged nation-wide and overwhelming demand for censorship four men appeared on Monday afternoon at the Y. M. C. A. Branch on Twenty-third Street, near Seventh Avenue. The auditorium in which the meeting was held has seats for probably two hundred and the four men looked lost. There were also three reporters and Dr. Wilbur F. Crafts. Mr. Crafts addressed the meeting at great length and helped the reporters all he could to make a story. One man who looked like a well-known character in Dickens' "Martin Chuzzlewit" arose and recited with evident resentment the defeat of the censorfiends before the late Mayor Gaynor. He insinuated improper motives on the part of the late Mayor. The "audience" listened in silence.

Mr. Crafts spoke for the better part of an hour. He made some remarkable statements. He said that at present there existed a rule that every motion picture house must take four films and pay for them whether they are fit to exhibit or not. He also said that according to his information not enough time was given to the production of films and declared it was shameful to film Hamlet in twenty-four hours and then hold it up before the newly arrived emigrant. He further remarked that there would be grades of approval as soon as the new censorship bill became a law. He also predicted a great increase in the production and use of educational films as soon as censorship became effective.

"SAFETY FIRST."

Motion Pictures As An Aid To An Important Campaign.

The "Safety First" Forum had its first meeting at the Biltmore Hotel, Monday, May 18th. A galaxy of men distinguished in public affairs and many high city officials attended. Among the latter was Mayor Mitchel, Borough President Marcus M. Marks, and Chief Magistrate William McAdoo. Ogden L. Mills, who is the moving spirit in the campaign, presided.

A series of motion pictures was shown graphically illustrating the perils of the streets. A large number of slides were also exhibited, but the motion pictures enlisted the greatest attention and will be used as widely as possible to educate the public in this most vital matter of safety. The great address of the evening was made by Mayor Mitchel, who paid a glowing tribute not only to the exhibitors who have come forward to aid in the campaign, but to the motion picture industry generally. He said that he believed the exhibitors of motion pictures was entitled to consideration and to protection in his calling. The Mayor promised his support to any movement looking toward protection of the exhibitor in his rights and privileges. Other speakers referring to the valuable aid of the motion picture paid similar tribute both to the men who have given their help and to the great invention itself. They characterized the motion picture as undoubtedly the most efficient aid in educating the general public on subjects of general importance such as sanitation, safety, etc.

"Nina of the Theater."

A Strong Two-Reel Kalem Which Marks the Opening of a Serial Featuring Alice Joyce.

Reviewed by George Blaisdell.

THE Kalem Company will release on June 8 "Nina of the Theater," a two-part subject. It is the first of a series in which Alice Joyce will be featured, and the numbers of which will be issued every other week. We are not given to understand by the initial story that its successors will have any relation to it; to the contrary, it would seem that each one will be independent of the others. In "Nina of the Theater" the atmosphere is not entirely of the stage. There is much in it of a hospital and of the life of a doctor wrapped up in original research to the exclusion of his wife's happiness. The interest is well sustained throughout. There are good situations, some of them of marked strength. Perhaps one or two of the hospital scenes may appeal to some as bordering on the harrowing, although there is no material justification for the feeling; it may be due to the dramatic events leading up to the operation, the sacrifice the actress is making for the benefit of the actor-sweetheart who has been incapacitated, it had been feared for many months.

Scene from "Nina of the Theater" (Kalem).

Miss Joyce in her portrayal displays the sympathy and feeling which she has brought to all of her later work. Her role is that of an actress in love with one of her fellow-players. When he is injured she submits to an operation which may cause permanent or temporary disfigurement. We are not told what the surgeons seek to gain or to establish by this rather unusual procedure, but we do see that there is an accompanying compensation of a thousand dollars for the one who submits to it. The chief surgeon who falls in love with his patient and fails to convey to the waiting lover her message may have been unprofessional in a degree but he was easily within the bounds of human probability. That a man who wins a woman by these tactics should also prove to be a poor husband also is perhaps the natural thing.

In the opening of the story there is a striking view of a stage from the wings, with the audience also in the range of view. In the hospital scenes there is an unusual fidelity to detail. There is plainly in evidence the hand of a sure-enough doctor. The same statement is true of the laboratory of the physician in which Dr. Brent devotes so much of his time and on the experiments in which he spends so much of his income that he has not enough left to replenish his wife's wardrobe.

The strongest moment follows the return of the wife to the stage when in disgust she has left her husband. She has been given her old part. During rehearsal a falling piece of property has injured the leading man. The stage manager recalls meeting the actor who had formerly played opposite Mrs. Brent. The telephone summons the old-time player to the theater, where he has just time to don a costume. As the actress makes her entrance to the stage the two former lovers are face to face. It is a real situation—one that well may have come perilously near breaking up the show.

There is a thrill in the ensuing scenes, when the wife is summoned to her home by a note from the husband who feels illness approaching. Her struggles with the crazed man, the pursuit through the various rooms, and the tragic end of the doctor when he loses his balance, as he has his overworked mind, and falls to the floor below, form a wind-up that is smashing literally as well as figuratively.

Tom Moore plays the actor and Jere Austin, Dr. Brent. The work of the two, supplements in skillful manner, that of Miss Joyce.

Vitagraph Theater Changes Bill.

"Captain Alvarez," a Six-Part Drama, and "Wife Wanted," Two-Reel Comedy, Make Fine Entertainment.

THE Vitagraph Theater changed its bill on Monday, May 18. On their way to the theaters of the country were sent "Mr. Barnes of New York" and "Love, Luck and Gasoline." For the first time were shown "Wife Wanted," a two-reel comedy, and "Captain Alvarez," a six-part romantic drama. As an opening, "curtain lowerers," if you will, there was thrown on the screen a single reel of "Vitagraph Girls," in which first were shown the smiling faces of many of the new-comers to the Vitagraph studio and at the end those of the older and better known. It was a popular hit. Following came a short "Japanese-American Fishing Industry at Santa Monica, Cal." It was interesting.

"Wife Wanted" was the cause of a lot of fun. Albert Roccardi as Uncle Joe headed a cast which contained also Ralph Ince, Billy Quirk, Anita Stewart, Lucille Lee and James Lackaye. Ralph Ince was the director. The picture will rank with some of the best of the Vitagraph comedies. "Captain Alvarez," which was reviewed in the May 9 issue of the Moving Picture World, was closely followed and held the interest of a full house. It was liberally applauded at the conclusion of the performance. William D. Taylor in the title role made a hit, especially in his riding of the unruly animal and the crossing on horseback of the slender bridge.

"The New Stenographer" continues as the silent comedy feature. Its popularity has been too great to permit of its retirement with the other factors of the former entertainment. Those who saw the performance on Monday and who had also seen "The New Stenographer" when it was first put on realized that in the intervening weeks it had been strengthened. There have been no essential changes, but some of the lesser details have been sharpened until it is even funnier than in the beginning—and that is saying much. The entertainment in its several parts and as a whole is the equal of its predecessors.

FAMOUS PLAYERS ENGAGE GABY DESLYS.

Adolph Zukor, President of the Famous Players Film Company, engaged, on the eve of her departure for Paris, the celebrated international star, Gaby Deslys, to appear in an important feature film, subject to be produced in Paris, under the direction of Edwin S. Porter and Hugh Ford, who sailed for Europe on May 7, for the purpose of producing a series of spectacular film subjects in England, France, Spain and Italy.

Gaby Deslys, who was quite excited over her first film engagement, said: "My most immediate plan after my arrival in France is to make my first appearance before the motion picture camera in a stupendous spectacular production for the Famous Players. I have arranged to meet Mr. Porter and Mr. Ford in Paris. From what I have seen of the preliminary plans for this production, I am convinced that the cost of this subject will be in the neighborhood of $100,000 and people have so often said I am a good judge of values that I almost believe it myself."

CHICAGO LETTER

BY JAS. S. McQUADE

Some Particulars About "One Wonderful Night."

GEORGE K. SPOOR, president of the Essanay Company, expressed himself as being highly pleased with the story given in the last issue of The World concerning the winning of the "Typical American Hero" contest by Francis X. Bushman.

Mr. Spoor tells me that from 80 to 100 people will be employed in the production of "One Wonderful Night." All the interiors will be made in the Chicago studio, while the big exteriors will all be made in New York city.

Prominent among these exterior views will be the Plaza Hotel, Central Park, upper and lower Fifth Avenue, the McAlpin Hotel, the Tombs, lower Third Avenue, the East Side, Riverside Drive, Grant's Tomb, Hudson River at Yonkers, Broadway and 34th Street, Times Square, the Cunard dock, etc., etc.

The Essanay company of players will proceed to New York about June 7 or 8, Mr. Spoor states.

Who Made These Pictures?

A lady who resides in the state of Nebraska writes to me, in part, as follows:

"In June, 1911, when Ex-President Francisco Madero went south from El Paso to Mexico City, pictures were made along the way of his party, train, etc.

"On June 4, when he passed through Torreon and Gomez Palacio, pictures were made at the railroad stations, and it happened that my husband, who has since died, appeared in the groups of people. If these pictures could be obtained, would it be practicable to have an enlargement made from his pictures?

"We have no late pictures of my husband and I should so like to have one for myself and for our children.

"It seems to me that nearly all the moving pictures we saw in Mexico were made by French companies; but, of course, I have no idea who made these particular films."

Will anyone who can give information as to the whereabouts of these Mexican pictures please communicate with the Chicago office of the Moving Picture World?

Recent Happenings in Colorado.

H. H. Buckwalter, of Denver, has favored me with the following resume of recent happenings in film circles, in Colorado:

"The first of the large companies to make pictures in Colorado this summer is the Lubin aggregation under Romaine Fielding, who has picked out Colorado Springs as headquarters. That Mr. Fielding is a big man who handles big business in a big way is certainly the opinion of the writer. He has stopped at nothing to get the best, and if he wants the state capitol for an incidental fire scene or a robbers' roost insert I can readily see the big granite building getting on the Lubin prop list.

"Fielding landed the biggest prize in the West the other day. He leased Glen Eyrie, General Palmer's castle, three miles from Colorado Springs. This estate covers about 1,000 acres of the most wonderful scenic domain ever seen. The place cost possibly $5,000,000 and is a great, rambling castle nestling in a canon off the famous Garden of the Gods. In fact the prettiest and widest scenic surroundings of the world-famous garden are in the Glen and the lease, of course, prohibits others from making pictures therein.

"To get some idea of the lavish expenditure of money by the late General Palmer, when he was building his 'modest' cottage, it may be explained that the rock face was brought from New Bedford to Colorado Spring by express, and each stone was carefully wrapped in burlap to avoid injuring the mosses and lichens — which promptly died in the dry air of Colorado soon after the building was finished. The place has its own water works of sufficient capacity to supply a town of 5,000 inhabitants. The electric light plant would supply a town of double that size, and as a technical piece of electrical engineering, is almost unique. The engines are French turbines and the boiler plant is as complete as a college testing laboratory. Every item of information and operating is recorded on automatic machines. Even the temperature and composition of the flue gases are written on paper tape. The gates connecting remote places on the estate have not only recording indicators, but they have time locks so they cannot be opened for a specified number of minutes after closing. When alive, General Palmer rode almost daily and he took this precaution to prevent the usual crowd of beggars following him across the hills and canons.

"The place has a conservatory and hot houses covering several acres, and a most wonderful collection of tropical plants as well as the more common varieties are always in bloom. The stables can accommodate possibly 150 animals, with everything that goes with a string of this sort. The clocks in the place kept one man busy, but he also attended to the temperature and weather recording devices, of which General Palmer was extremely fond.

"With a place like this the Lubin productions will certainly have a distinction and reality far removed from the mere studio efforts of regal splendor and affluence, and, in my opinion, Mr. Fielding is big enough and brainy enough and enthusiastic enough to make the best of the opportunity. But, in addition to this, he has gone even further. The most noted house, socially, in Colorado Springs is easily the Hagerman residence, on aristocratic Cascade Avenue—a street that has more millionaires than any other similar thoroughfare in the world. Hagerman was one of the big financiers of two decades ago. He built the Colorado Midland railroad and was deeply interested in the Rio Grande and later opened up the Pecos Valley of New Mexico. It was his ambition to build the finest home in America, and he almost accomplshed his desire in Colorado Springs.

"Fielding heard about this magnificent place—where royalty had been entertained and the richest in America had sought invitations. He got it on a year's lease and at once planned using it as the 'town studio.' The offices of the Lubin forces will be maintained in the Antlers Hotel, a few blocks away.

"The next big company to open work in Colorado will probably be one of the Universal groups. W. H. Swanson was here yesterday and what he had in contemplation he refused to announce until after the suits in New York had been disposed of. But one item of interest in his visit was the decision of the Universal to take over all the Swanson exchanges, and it is likely Harry T. Nolan will be made general manager of the Western end of this branch.

"The company under 'Obey' Thayer at Canon City is plugging away in an enthusiastic manner on several new and thrilling productions that will soon be finished and released through Warner's.

"Some of the Denver exhibitors have become disheartened with adverse conditions and have wired eastern manufacturers to suggest some plan for 'saving us from ourselves.' Five to eight reels of first run for a nickel and the anxiety to 'run somebody out of town' make a bad combination that will first have to be dispensed with before there can be a ray of hope. Much more co-operation and brotherly feeling and much less bitterness are badly needed in Denver, and there is a strong opinion that appeals to manufacturers may bring about another cataclysm such as struck the town about eighteen months ago, as a result of wild-eyed, but softy-voiced, ideas of running things.

"Andrew C. Carson, for many years manager of the local Orpheum Theater, resigned a week ago and will devote his time to writing scenarios—for which he is well fitted and fully trained. Many years in the newspaper and magazine business and a very intimate connection with dramatic companies—as the original author of 'Arizona'—would indicate success in his new field.

"The Denver papers announce the arrest of a couple of bunco men, named Hayden and Widdof, who have for years thrived off the innocent by pretending to sell all sorts of motion picture enterprises. They have been in jail several times, and always managed to escape on technicalities; but this time the district attorney as well as other officers seem determined to rid Denver of this sort of game.

"Sex and white slave pictures ad nauseum have been running in Denver, notwithstanding that this is the home of the female 'sufferer' who shines in all her glory on election day. The unfortunate outcome will undoubtedly bring censorship where it is not deserved for the objectionable pictures are not being run in the regular picture houses."

Chicago Film Brevities.

Robert R. Levy, Wm. J. Sweeney, C. C. Whalen, Sam Katz and Harry Hyman, the committee specially in charge of the reception and ball given by the Chicago branch of the International Motion Picture Exhibitors' Association, in the Coliseum, deserve great praise for perfect arrangements and for the fine success of the big undertaking. Chicago members of the association are also to be complimented generally on the spirit and energy displayed.

Bill "Kalem" Wright, busy as he was during his short stay in the city last week, found time to drop in and say "howdy?"—and we were all glad to see him. His friends in Chicago are legion and, if anyone doubts it, he should have attended the ball at the Coliseum. The Kalem box was as popular as that of any "stag" box in the big building. If Miss Alice Joyce could have come along, the Kalem box would have been still more popular.

Mr. and Mrs. F. O. Nielsen were reminded on May 15, by their employees of the Parkway Theater, this city, that the second anniversary of the opening of that house had again come around. Beautiful floral offerings, the gifts of the employees, decked the stage and the main entrances. After the final presentation, on the date mentioned, Mr. and Mrs. Nielsen entertained their loyal helpers at supper. There were present: Monte Gloss, Mrs. Inez L. Slusser, Miss Olive Bergeron, Charles McKeil and Paul Pavich.

George Kleine announces that he will present in the near future "Pierrot, the Prodigal," a photodrama based on the opera of that name. Mario Costa, the composer of the opera, arranged the accompanying music for this subject while it was being produced, thus fitting the tempo of the score to the movement of the photoplayers and the action generally. This is the perfect type of music for pictures and, doubtless, the practice of having a composer or arranger present during the production of feature subjects will be widely followed in the future. "Pierrot, the Prodigal" is a little over three reels and will be a novelty, in that it will have no subtitles as well as in the manner already referred to.

The Broadway Theater, Denver, recently presented the Selig Panama Canal pictures, in six reels, for a run of eleven days. The films aroused considerable interest, but inclement weather prevented crowded houses.

"Magda, the Modern Madame X," after the owners had secured a writ of mandamus against the city to prevent interference with the presentation of the films, has been prevented from being shown by an injunction obtained by Henry W. Savage, the well known eastern theatrical manager, on the ground that it is an infringement upon his title of "Madame X" and also that it is an exact duplicate in story and action. The case will be heard shortly.

"Neptune's Daughter" was given its first presentation in Chicago Saturday, May 16, in the Fine Arts Theater, leased by Mr. Hamburger. Miss Annette Kellerman, who appears in the titular role of the photodrama, is a popular favorite in the city and her admirers crowded the theater to see her in pictues.

The Superior Feature Film Company, 37 S. Wabash Avenue, Chicago, recently secured the exclusive rights for Indiana and Michigan of "Fire and Sword," a spectacular, six-reel international photodrama, produced by the Kismet Feature Film Company, of New York, and staged by T. Hayes Hunter, of Biograph fame. The Superior acquired the Illinois and Wisconsin rights to this spectacle several weeks ago.

J. C. Miller, of Woodstock, Ill., made a pleasant call last week. He stated that he had closed the Princess Theater in that town about four weeks ago, and remodeled the Palace Theater, which he is now running under the name of the Princess. This house now seats 420 people, and admission is five and ten cents for four reels of Licensed service. The Princess runs features once a week, chosen from the product of the Celebrated Players' Film Company, the Famous Players, and others. Next week he will show Mary Pickford in "Caprice." Mr. Miller stated that business is very satisfactory.

The Chicago office was honored with a visit last week by Miss Miriam Nesbitt and Marc MacDermott, the famous Edison photoplayers. I had not seen Miss Nesbitt since 1900, when she played the "lisping girl" in Daniel and Charles Frohman's delightful comedy, "The White Horse Tavern." I chanced to be business manager of that attraction at the time, and always counted myself lucky when I could stay back with the show for a night and see the performance. Miss Anne Sutherland was the buxom, vivacious hostess, and Frederick Bond (since dead) the humorous waiter. Miss Nesbitt, as the lisping girl, engaged in some of the most heart-catching love scenes it has been the lot of many to view, then or since. Looking back, even after this short space of time, the sweet little comedy seems like a memory of boyhood, when the world was fair and love breathed the fragrance of the honeysuckle and clover blossom. Thanks, friends, for the honor and the pleasure that your visit brought.

George K. Spoor, whose name was omitted from the list of people in the Essanay box at the ball, in the Coliseum, was present all right. He was missed by me in the big throng.

LOVING CUP FOR SAM LONG.

The "old guard" of the Kalem Company, consisting of Charles Hill, Joseph Spray, George Hardy, Ralph Martin, Ernest Gergely and A. Collins, men who have been in the employ of the company since its incorporation seven years ago, presented Samuel Long, president of the company, with a handsome loving cup of silver, properly inscribed, on May 20th. Appropriate presentation remarks were made by Mr. Hill in behalf of the "old guard," to which Mr. Long replied with considerable feeling. May 2nd was the date of the organization of the Kalem Company seven years ago.

Renters Organize for Protection

Feature Film Men Will First Turn Their Attention to the "Bicycling" Practice Around New York—Other "Uplifts" Also in View.

WHAT is regarded as one of the most important steps which has yet been taken in the moving picture business around New York City looking toward a more systematic control of the relations between exhibitors and renting agencies and manufacturers was announced Wednesday morning, May 20, in the organization of the Feature Film Renters' Association at a meeting held the evening before in the offices of the Box Office Attractions Company, at No. 130 West Forty-sixth Street.

A concerted effort is to be made by the feature film renters to bring about reforms which have long been advocated in the business reforms which will mean a general "clean-up" among the exhibitors and the elimination of business practices which have long been regarded as a menace to the future success of the entire moving picture industry.

While the organization of the renting interests has been affected with more than one object in view, it is said that the drastic action which is about to be taken around New York City will be chiefly directed against the practice on the part of a certain class of exhibitors which is known as "bicycling."

In New York City, where it is not at all uncommon to find two or more moving picture theaters in a block and the name of a single individual listed on the city's license books as the proprietor of as many as a half a dozen theaters, the trick known as "bicycling" is pretty generally known among exhibitors. It is worked this way: An exhibitor who owns a couple of theaters, removed from each other by a number of blocks, will rent a special feature for one of his theaters and, by doubling up on the posters in order that he may have sufficient billing matter, will use the picture in both houses through the simple expedient of shuttling it back and forth between the two houses by means of a boy on a bicycle. Sometimes, indeed, the exhibitor who rents the feature arranges to get a part, if not all, of the rental price back by making a cash arrangement with a house outside of his exhibiting zone in which he has no proprietary interest.

Film renters who control features base their business on the number of days' rental it is possible for them to secure for a feature. What they pay for a picture, in either buying it outright or leasing it for certain territory, is determined by this possible aggregate in the rental returns. Very naturally, then, any practice which permits of the showing of a feature in more than one theater with the payment of but a single theater rental is one which strikes at the very foundation of their business and is therefore one which they feel like using all possible efforts to wipe out.

"Bicycling" has been going on around New York for a long time. Individual renting agencies have done what they could to prevent it, but, because there has always been another feature agency anxious to take over a customer who had been dropped by a competitor, even for unfair practices, little has been accomplished in stopping the practice. The Feature Film Renters' Association, in which are represented practically all of the important feature film people in the business, is an organization for mutual protection in this "bicycling" business.

At the meeting held for organization the following concerns were represented: Unique Feature Film Co., 145 West 45th Street; Theater Film Co., Ltd., 71 West 23d Street; Eagle Feature Film Co., 71 West 23d Street; Exclusive Features, Inc., 71 West 23d Street; De Luxe Feature Film Co., Inc., 71 West 23d Street; Eclectic Feature Film Exchange, 115 East 23d Street; Box Office Attraction Co., 130 West 46th Street; Warner's Features, Inc., 130 West 46th Street; All-Star Film Renting Co., Inc., 110 West 40th Street; Wm. L. Sherry's Feature Film Co., 130 West 46th Street; World Film Corporation, 130 West 46th Street; Regal Feature Film Co., Inc., 71 West 23rd Street; The Film Exchange, 37 West 39th Street; Photo-Drama Film Co., 220 West 42d Street; Special Feature Film Co., 288 Market Street, Newark, N. J.; Mecca Feature Film Co., 130 West 46th Street; Emby Feature Film Co., 145 West 45th Street.

To the initiated, the names of the concerns given will suggest still other big film interests that can reasonably be counted upon to support the policies of the association. In a broad way, it is said that every important film renting agency in New York City, including the General Film Company, is interested.

At the first meeting of the renters a permanent organization was effected, with the election of the following officers: President, Julius Bernstein; vice-president, Abe Carlos; corresponding secretary, Charles H. Streimer; recording secretary, Moe Streimer; treasurer, Robert Richter. Board of Directors: Robert Richter, Moe Streimer, Harry Samwick, Abe Carlos, and W. B. Isaacs. It was announced that the temporary offices of the association would be at No. 71 West Twenty-third Street, mail being addressed in care of the Eagle Feature Film Company.

A definite plan for the correction of the "bicycling" trick was outlined at the meeting. The association is to have a grievance committee. A detective agency is to be permanently employed for the purpose of spotting the exhibitors who are guilty of shooting their features around to houses other than the one named in the contract which the exhibitor signs when he accepts a feature from the renting agency. With proof in their possession, the grievance committee are empowered to summon the guilty exhibitor before them to confront him with his violation of contract. If it appears that there has been "bicycling," the committee will summarily prohibit all members of the association from providing the guilty exhibitor with film in the future, or at least until such time as satisfactory guarantee has been provided that the exhibitor will abide by the terms of his renting contract.

Among the other practices which have been particularly annoying to the renters and are slated for correction by the association, it is said, is the very common one of non-payment of bills and the not infrequent one of unnecessarily damaging the prints supplied through carelessness on the part of the projection man. The association will be a clearing house for credits and the exhibitor who fails to meet his obligations to any member of the association will find it hard sledding with other members. Complaints made by any member of the association to the effect that film sent an exhibitor has been damaged because of the carelessness of an operator or the unsatisfactory condition of a projecting machine will be investigated and the results given to every member of the association for their guidance in dealing with the particular exhibitor named in the future.

A prominent and particularly aggressive feature film renter, who is said to have been largely responsible for the organization of the association at this time, had the following to say: "The association has started with half a dozen different things specifically laid out for accomplishment. While these are being worked out, it is a certainty that other equally important things will arise and, for this reason, we may say that the association is a permanent institution in the feature rental business which will prosecute general 'uplift' work, primarily for the benefit of the members of the association, but in a more general way, for the benefit of every individual engaged in the business of entertaining the public with the aid of moving pictures."

Pictures to Carry Trade Message

Representative American Manufacturers to Campaign in Latin-American Countries with "Movies'" Aid—Lasky to Besiege Exhibitors.

Several of the largest representative American manufacturing plants in full operation are to be taken to South America next by means of the "movies" in order that the merchants there may see the advanced method of making American goods. Joseph J. Keegan and H. J. Rosencrantz, of No. 15 Maiden Lane, who are managing the forthcoming tour of American manufacturers to the Latin-American countries aboard the chartered steamship "Kroonland," have made arrangements with a motion picture concern for the projection of the moving pictures of the plants in operation, in the twenty cities the party is to visit.

The arrangement for the moving pictures of the factories is said to have been made at the request of several manufacturing concerns, the size of whose product prevented them from giving satisfactory demonstrations aboard the exposition ship.

By this method the makers of road-building machines, conveyors, laundry supplies, and other large machines may show their wares in full operation without the necessity of carrying the actual machinery.

The Jesse L. Lasky Feature Play Company has arranged for the exclusive motion picture exhibitors' privilege on board the "Kroonland," which will bear some thirty odd American salesmen with a representation on board of exhibitions from fifty or sixty manufacturers, and among the manufacturers will be the Lasky company in a fully equipped motion picture theater. The Lasky features, including "The Squaw Man," "Brewster's Millions," "The Master Mind," "The Only Son" and "The Virginian" will be shown in the various ports to various Latin-American motion picture exhibitors. This will be the first time in the history of motion pictures that a foreign trade display was made.

Crook Actors Escape from the Screen

Strand Theater Burglarized, with the Plot Reading Like the Most Frenzied Scenario Ever Turned Out.

THE Strand Theater, at Broadway and Forty-seventh Street, recently opened as New York's most palatial home of the photoplay, was burglarized early Monday morning. Scanning the various New York dailies Monday afternoon and Tuesday morning, one would have been justified in the belief that the burglary had resulted through some of the Strand's crook actors having escaped from the picture screen and "pulling" something in real life. Certainly no wilder plot was ever written for a melodrama, for production with or without lines, than was the one unfolded to the police department in explanation of just what had taken place during the early dark hours of Monday morning in the Strand. That the police began their investigations with their "tongues in their cheeks," moreover, is indicated by the fact that before the legal machinery was set in motion looking toward the apprehension of the burglars, Manager S. L. Rothapfel and Treasurer Jacob M. Engel, of the Strand, were apprised of the penalties which could be visited upon a perjurer and were then required to set forth in an affidavit that they had not arranged the "burglary" for the purpose of obtaining publicity.

Early published reports of the amount of money which had been stolen designated $10,000 as the sum; later in the day, the amount was fixed at approximately $5,000, and, in the affidavit signed by the Strand people, the amount had dwindled to $1,693.

According to the plot of the burglary, the thieves secured admission to the theater by representing themselves as detectives who had come to search the house for a valuable lavalliere which they said had been lost the night before. Once inside they tide up four workmen who were engaged in making some improvement in the theater, made the night watchman "eat out of their hand" to the extent of serving as a blind for them in the lobby and, for the three hours required to complete their job, punching a half a dozen time clocks around the theater to signal to a neighboring burglar alarm station that everything was all right, secured the loot, and made their getaway. Expensive draperies torn from the walls and thoroughly soaked in water were wrapped around the safe in order to deaden the sound of the explosion when three charges of "soup" were set off after the strong-box had been scientifically drilled with the aid of electricity. Two of the men in the theater who had been "stuck up" by the burglars were cracked over the heads with the butt of a heavy pistol, in the most approved fashion, and tumbled into a dark room in the basement in an unconscious condition.

In the three days following the burglary, no developments in the police hunt for the burglars had been announced by the New York dailies. The Strand's press department is still doing business at the old stand. It is merely a coincidence that, by Manager Rothapfel's confession, a trial performance of a photoplay written by ex-Deputy Commissioner of Police, George S. Dougherty, dealing with the operations of criminals and introducing Mr. Dougherty as one of the characters, was given in the theater Sunday morning. It is also a coincidence that "The Master Mind," a photoplay from the drama by the same name, which illustrates in detail just how present day "yeggmen" use modern electrical appliances in "copping the swag" is underlined as the principal attraction at the theater for the week of May 25th.

FROM COAST TO COAST IN NEW YORK.

Vitagraph Publicity Campaigning Expedition Has Progressed No Farther than the Bronx in Approximately Two Weeks.

Tuesday, May 5th, Dave MacFayden, dressed in sombrero, chaps, and a leather shirt, set out from the Vitagraph studios, near Coney Island, to drive two horses hooked to a "light housekeeping" wagon from New York to San Francisco for the purpose of spreading Vitagraph and Waterson, Berlin & Snyder publicity.

Sunday evening, May 17, from all appearances Mr. MacFayden had succeeded in progressing no farther than 177th Street in the Bronx district of New York City—for the chap who wore the sombrero, the chaps, and the leather shirt that evening was delighting the natives of the Bronx by quick changes to the costume of an ice cream cone vender for the purpose of energetically "plugging" a new song entitled, "By the Seaside."

Let it be understood that, despite the sombrero, the chaps, and the leather shirt, Mr. MacFayden is primarily a "plugger" of Broadway song successes and is neither a cowpuncher or a moving picture actor.

When the coast-to-coast advertising expedition was promoted a couple of weeks ago, information on the subject was abundantly furnished. The Vitagraph company took moving pictures of the drive from the studios in Flatbush to New York and of the outfit in front of the Vitagraph Theater on Broadway at Forty-fourth Street. Explanation of MacFayden's snail-like progress during the past twelve days which have apparently been consumed in getting by the various ports of call between Times Square and the Bronx have thus far escaped the usual publicity mediums.

The Kitsee Talking Pictures

Reviewed by Hugh Hoffman.

THE Cort-Kitsee Talking Picture is one of the few, if not the only one, that has the right idea behind it in the way of securing popularity. This idea is that of presenting talking pictures of artists who are known drawing cards. In presenting Harry Lauder as the first subject, the proper start has been made. The Kitsee pictures are being booked like a vaudeville act. I was not given a look at the mechanism and therefore must concern myself only with the screen results.

It will not do to exhibit trivial subjects of this kind and expect them to get by on the strength of what novelty there may be left in synchronization. After the public has been shown that synchronization is possible the novelty ceases to exist and audiences want to see something worth looking at.

The Harry Lauder pictures were shown last week at the Palace Theater, New York, where they were billed as a big time headliner. Half the battle was won before the pictures came on because everybody knows Lauder, and the moment he appeared there was an ovation. The people did not bother their heads about synchronization or how it was accomplished; they were looking at and listening to Harry Lauder all by himself, and his work was what got the applause and what held them to the end. Therefore it is quite certain that when talking picture people realize that their line of entertainment calls for the very best of talent, just that soon will they begin to prosper.

Let us have records of Caruso, Farrar, Schuman-Heink, and their kind in plain songs without any attempt at operatic production. As the voice of Nordica is gone forever, so will the other great voices disappear from the face of the the earth, never to be known again except in memory. Why not put them on record? There are thousands of people in the smaller towns who want to see these people, but who will never get a chance to see them in the flesh. Never mind the cheap minstrel first-parts or the song and dance stuff with the dancers' feet cut off; let us have the pure product and it will surely be well patronized.

It is a pity in talking pictures that the phonograph cannot be improved upon, but if it cannot be improved upon it will have to be taken for what it is and accepted as the only practical way of reproducing a speaking likeness.

BURNS YACHT FOR PICTURE SCENE.

During George Terwilliger's operations with his Lubin company at St. Augustine, Fla., he did some pretty expensive and daring stunts. For a picture entitled "A Man From the Sea," an automobile was run off a dock into the ocean, two people were in the machine, Anna Luther being one, and the chauffeur, who was an expert swimmer and diver. As the machine touched the water, both jumped as the auto sank to the bottom. Miss Luther and the diver reached shore rather wet, but received no injury.

Another expensive scene was the total destruction of a yacht by fire and dynamite. The vessel was an old one, stripped of all its interior fittings and painted white. It was then saturated with oil and turpentine and well charged with dynamite. Being anchored away out from shore, several men had to be placed on the yacht to fire it and then jump for their lives into the sea to be picked up by motor boats and rapidly carried to a safe distance. For fully an hour the flames proceeded to devour the yacht before the dynamite was touched. When the explosion took place the craft buckled and in a few minutes sank to the bottom of the ocean.

After several other daring scenes the company arrived back in Philadelphia all safe with the exception of Pete Volkman, who is still in the hospital suffering from a gun shot.

INJUNCTION CONTINUED.

In the suit brought by Klaw & Erlanger against Lewis-Pennant Features, Judge Philbin, of the Supreme Court of New York, continued the injunction against the use of the title, "Woman Against Woman," for a photoplay which the Lewis Pennant Features had been exhibiting under the title of "Woman Against Woman," or "Rescued in the Clouds."

Klaw & Erlanger copyrighted a photoplay, founded upon the play, "Woman Against Woman," which was distributed by the General Film Company.

Chicago Exhibitors' Ball

Over Eight Thousand People Attended the Brilliant Event to See Famous Photoplayers of Leading American Film Manufacturers.

By James S. McQuade.

THE first reception and ball given by the Chicago branch of the International Motion Picture Association took place in the Coliseum, Thursday evening, May 14th. The doors were opened at 7:30, and for two hours after that time a steady stream of people passed through, until the vast hall and galleries were occupied by 8,000 people and over.

The dancing space was enclosed on all sides by rows of boxes, all neatly decorated, and adding to the fine color effect of the scene. Prominent among these boxes, because of their attractive signs and decorations, were those reserved by the Essanay Company, George Kleine, the Lubin Company, the Vitagraph Company, the Selig Polyscope Company, the Edison Company, and the Mutual. Approach to most of these boxes was almost impossible throughout the evening, as the great concourse of people were anxious to see with their own eyes the living men and women who are their favorites in photoplays.

It was really a most instructive lesson on the wonderful hold secured by these photoplayers on the minds of their admirers, to watch the throng file past. The hands and arms of all these popular idols of picture theater goers were sore and tired long before the throng began to dwindle.

Francis X. Bushman, Marc MacDermott, Billy Quirk and Harry Meyers were well nigh worn out by the ordeal. Miss Miriam Nesbitt, of the Edison Company; Mrs. Clara Kimball Young, of the Vitagraph Company; Miss Rosemary Theby and Miss Florence Hackett, of the Lubin Company; Miss Adrienne Kroell, of the Selig Polyscope Company; Miss Ruth Stonehouse, Miss Beverly Bayne and Miss Gerda Holmes, of the Essanay Company, and Miss Florence La Badie and Miss Marguerite Snow of the Thanhouser Company, were all exhausted by acceding to the desire of the multitude to press their hands.

In addition to the dancing numbers indulged in by those in attendance, the local committee provided a program of specialties for the evening's entertainment. Among these were: Remick's quartet, Baby and Tommy Paine in tango and hesitation waltzes; Manning and Butler, singers; Humphrey and Humphrey, tango dancers; Flo Jacobson, singer; John Baxter, basso, and Ted Snyder's male octet. King's Military Band, of Chicago, furnished the music during the evening.

Chicago exhibitors turned out en masse for the occasion and various committees attended carefully to the comfort of the visiting photoplayers and those in attendance. The great crowds that surged through the aisles were well handled by appointed overseers who kept them moving constantly so as to permit progress to and fro.

Everything was conducted with the utmost decorum, and even Major Funkhouser, head of the Chicago censorship and supervisor of Chicago's morals, who was accompanied by Alderman Geiger, could find no objections to any of the dances given. The major beamed with smiles throughout the evening, while he was present, and was kept busy by the introductions given him to many of the film celebrities present.

Judge Adelor J. Petit and Fred W. Block occupied seats in the Thanhouser box, where Miss Florence La Badie and Miss Marguerite Snow were viewed by thousands of eyes. C. J. Hite, president of the Thanhouser Company, was also in the Mutual box.

A very enjoyable incident was afforded when C. C. Whelan, owner of the Washington Theater, and an officer of the local branch of the association, mounted the musician's stand and introduced every photoplayer present to the expectant throng on the Coliseum floor. As each lady or gentleman came forward, Mr. Whelan announced her or his name through a megaphone. Short speeches were made by the men and also in several case by the ladies. Each presentation was greeted with enthusiastic applause, which again showed the wonderful hold gained by photoplayers in the hearts and minds of their admirers.

The grand march followed at about 12:30 A. M. A committee of exhibitors bestowed considerable care on selecting the leaders in this march. As arranged by the members of this committee, the order was as follows, although a slight departure was made from the directions, in some cases, through some misunderstanding, before the march began: Mrs. Clara Kimball Young with Francis X. Bushman, Miss Florence La Badie with Marc MacDermott, Miss Rosemary Theby with Billy Quirk, Miss Marguerite Snow with Harry Meyers, Miss Miriam Nesbitt with Harry Ashley, Miss Lillie Leslie with Joseph Smiley, etc.

About 1:30 o'clock most of the photoplayers in attendance had gone home to seek rest, and general dancing was continued until 3:30. Exceptionally good order was noticeable all through the evening's proceedings and much credit is due the various Chicago local committees for the great success of the event.

Few outside members of the association were in attendance, but Sam Trigger (the indefatigable), Jack Koerpel, Grant Anson and Adolph Weis, of New York, were present. So also were Charles H. Phillips, national president of the I. M. P. A.; Tom Saxe, George Fischer, James Graham, Henry Trinz and others, all from Milwaukee, and Thomas Furniss from Duluth, Minn.

Nor must it be overlooked that the redoubtable Bill "Kalem" (Bill Wright) was present in a Kalem box. He was a whole host to himself, as he carried with him 3,000 buttons, each of which showed the beautiful face of Miss Alice Joyce, leading lady of the Kalem Company. Bill was everywhere, and everybody was anxious to get one of the handsome tokens carried by him. He was introduced to the crowd by C. C. Whelan.

The boxes secured by prominent manufacturers were occupied as follows: The Selig box, by Miss Adrienne Kroell, Miss Rose Evans, Mr. and Mrs. Harold Vosburgh, Miss Lelia Frost, Miss Loraine Frost, Miss Grace Darmond, Mr. and Mrs. Palmer Bowman, Mr. and Mrs. Oscar Eagle, Miss Renee Kelly, Hilton Allyn, Mr. and Mrs. Cris Lane, Mr. and Mrs. Frank Weed, Baby Ruth Hayslett and Mr. and Mrs. Colin Reid.

The Essanay box by Geo. K. Spoor, Francis X. Bushman, Ruth Stonehouse, Mrs. Gerda Holmes and Rapley Holmes, Richard Travers, Bryant Washburn, Mr. and Mrs. E. Calvert, Beverly Bayne, Leo White, E. Redway, Wallace Beery, Harry Mainhall, Mr. Owens, Miss Dunkinson, Miss Helen Dunbar, Mr. Von Betz, J. Carroll, Ben Turpin, Mr. Keppler, Mr. Gronnell, Miss Boweker, Mr. Plank, Mr. Hopper, Mr. Botter, Mr. and Mrs. Harry Zech, Harry McRae Webster, Mr. and Mrs. V. R. Day and Mr. and Mrs. Don Meaney.

The Mutual box (in which the Thanhouser players were seated) by Miss Florence La Badie, Miss Marguerite Snow, James Cruze, Alfred Norton, Lloyd Lonergan (chief scenario writer of Thanhouser Company), Max Annenberg, and Charles J. Hite, president of Thanhouser. R. R. Seery, district manager of the Middle West for the Mutual, was also present, and Judge Adelor Petit and Fred W. Block, of Chicago, were guests.

The American Film Manufacturing Company's box by Mr. and Mrs. R. R. Nehls and party.

At the Sign of the Flaming Arcs

By George Blaisdell.

WALKED into the World office the other afternoon George Gebhart, old-time picture player and producer. He got the glad hand all around. Mr. Gebhart may locate permanently in New York—that is, as permanently as a picture man may be said to locate in these days of going far afield for locations. He has hooked up with the Ramo Company, and will produce pictures and at the same time do some playing. Mr. Gebhart is one of the oldest of the screen players, having been before the camera twelve years. In the early days Mr. Gebhart played leads with the Edison Company before there were such institutions as stock companies of picture actors. He has witnessed and participated in what might be described as practically the making of the moving picture business. He was with the Biograph Company when that organization was taking pictures solely for the mutascope, the nickel-in-the-slot machine—and later on manipulated with the penny—that was the forerunner of the marvels of to-day. He was also with the Biograph when D. W. Griffith reorganized the company, and among his associates were Arthur Johnson, Florence Lawrence, Marion Leonard and Charles Inslee. Mr. Gebhart played with the Vitagraph Company on the famous Nassau Street roof, when Commodore Blackton occasionally joined the cast. He admits that in the early days he saw the possibilities of the motion picture and that he had a fairly good idea that the business was going to be a great one, but that he never realized it would invade Broadway as it is doing to-day.

Mr. Genhart does not think picture players miss the footlights. He says that while he has been in the show business all his life, camera work has always had for him a fascination greater than that of the stage. "The silent drama has always had an appeal for me," said the late Pathe player. "There is something tangible about the camera. You know you are playing before the public when you are in front of the camera. That is your public right there. You have a conscious knowledge of it or a sort of sub-conscious feeling that you are really playing to the public."

Mr. Gebhart was taken over to Twenty-second Street and duly fitted, as he afterward aptly described the ceremony, to the famous Fireman's Shirt—even to the attachment of an extra button on each sleeve. It was this combination that so impressed John Steppling that he carried away with him to the coast not only a vivid memory of the substance but a certified copy of the recipe. Mr. Gebhart is chockablock with reminiscences of the stage and the screen. A native of Switzerland, he has in the course of his travels picked up many dialects. He has a fund of stories, some of the best being in the quaint broken English of the French-Canadian, such, for instance, so effectively employed by Dr. Drummond in his poems. Every picturegoer knows how finely Mr. Gebhart plays the red man. Questioned about his work in portraying the original American it quickly became apparent that much study had been given to the habits and characteristics of the wily native. Mr. Gebhart is not through with this class of portrayal; even now he has under consideration some really big plans.

Arthur Johnson was a recent visitor to New York. The Lubin leading man motored over from Philadelphia. At the Screen Club he got one of his old-time receptions.

Herbert Brenon is enjoying a two weeks' vacation on his farm in Fairhope, Ala.—just putting the finishing touches on his recuperation from the recent severe accident in Bermuda while making "Neptune's Daughter," and preparatory to getting busy on more pictures for the Universal program.

Mrs. Fiske in "Tess of the D'Urbervilles" was last week shown at Proctor's Fifth Avenue. This is another proof of the contention that a great production never gets old, that its life is the life of the negative.

Word comes from the other side of the water that Miss Florence Turner, under the direction of Larry Trimble, has just completed two subjects which are expected to eclipse anything so far done by Turner Films. The popular American player has been most cordially received in England, and for that matter in Scotland and Wales also, whether she appeared on the vaudeville stage or on the screen. "It makes one very humble indeed to find so many loyal and wonderful friends awaiting one," says Miss Turner in a recent letter to a friend here; "their enormous interest and enthusiasm have been almost startling, and oh! so much appreciated and enjoyed." Miss Turner last month had the pleasant experience of witnessing the first exhibition in an English theater of an all-British program, and by one maker. The pictures, of course, were Turner Films. They were shown to an audience of two thousand persons in historic Victoria Hall. The occasion was most successful. The arrangements were made by James A. Cotter, who is now associated with Turner Films.

Shannon Fife found time between his scenario work at the Lubin studio and his studies at the University of Pennsylvania to drop into New York last Saturday and look over the town. Which seems a sufficient peg on which to hang a story which recently came out of Lubinville. Fife was asked why he introduced three shades or ghosts in his two-reel mystery story, "The Mansion of Sobs." "That's easy," replied Fife. "Most companies in stories of this sort employ only two such characters, but in this case I wanted our company to have a shade the better of it." "That's right," Editor McCloskey is reported as replying, "Otherwise it wouldn't have had the ghost of a chance."

In "A Mother of Men," the second release of Olcott's International Features, some of the scenes of which are laid "before the war," Mr. Olcott used four negroes who were born in slavery. Mr. Olcott tells of one old colored fellow who hailed him one morning with the question: "Will you need any colored scenery to-day, Sah?"

William H. Wright, treasurer of the Excelsior Film Company, returned Monday from a week's visit to the company's studio at Lake Placid, in the Adirondacks. In spite of the cold weather—the thermometer was below the freezing point at times—Director Handworth has made excellent progress on the Excelsior's first production, 2,600 feet being completed on May 15. A meeting of the board of directors determined to dispose of the company's products on the state's rights plan. Mr. Wright says the twenty-two members of the stock company are working under most pleasant conditions, that all are pulling together, and that while they are very busy in the daytime, there are abundant means of recreation in the evenings. Mr. Wright has installed a piano, which is much enjoyed by an excellent quartet. Austin Huhn is giving valuable assistance to Mr. Handworth.

The Excelsior has opened quarters in Room 1002 in the World's Tower Building, 110 West Fortieth Street, which will be in charge of Arthur Rosenbach, sales manager. A projection room will be a part of the equipment, where intending buyers may at all times see the company's product.

The De Luxe Attractions Film Company has issued an elaborate sixteen-page booklet describing "Sealed Orders," one of its big features. Ample space has been provided for the insertion of the name of an intending exhibitor.

Daniel V. Arthur, managing director of The Playgoers' Film Company, has returned from Paris with the principal members of the company supporting Lina Cavalieri and Lucien Muratore in the picturization of "Manon Lescaut." Mr. Arthur expressed himself as highly gratified with the success attained in securing scenes in Paris, Amiens and Havre, as described by Abbe Prevost in his delightful love romance.

The decision of the Kalem Company to add to its program a single-reel release, beginning on June 16th, will have wide interest in the trade. It is an evidence or by many will be construed as evidence that the multiple-reel craze has reached its climax, that among many exhibitors there is a belief that after all the single-reel has a distinct value which has for some time been lost sight of. Talking this week with Bill Kalem Wright, he said that during his recent trip to Chicago he had consulted a great many exhibitors, and that without exception they were in favor of Kalem adding a one-reeler to its regular output. The addition gives the Twenty-third Street firm a program of seven reels a week—three singles and two doubles—besides every three weeks or so a four or five-reel feature.

New Mutual Publicity Men

Arthur James, of the Telegraph, and W. Bob Holland Join Phil Mindil's Staff of Editors and Feature Writers.

WHEN Harry E. Aitken, president of the Mutual Film Corporation, determined to organize a publicity department he recognized the great importance of publicity and, more than that, the prime necessity of getting publicity of the right kind at the right time. As everybody knows now, he selected Philip Mindil, acknowledged to be the most experienced of all the publicity men of New York, to get things in shape. How thoroughly Mr. Mindil has succeeded is best proved by the high character of the matter that going out from the Mutual publicity department and the great quantity of space that newspapers throughout the country are devoting to Mutual stories and items.

Arthur James.

The success of the department has encouraged the Mutual people to develop publicity along other lines and, therefore, we are to have a "Mutual Girl Weekly" to supplement the work of that other excellent house organ, "Reel Life." With the increased activities of the Mutual publicity department came the necessity of increasing the staff. The most recent additions thereto are most significant. Arthur James, editor of the New York Sunday Telegraph, author of the "Beau Broadway" column in The Morning Telegraph, for which he has written more than 60,000 scintillant paragraphs, and one of the best informed and most prolific American newspaper writers, will be Mr. Mindil's correspondent for Reliance and Majestic in Los Angeles, where the $100,000-a-year director, D. W. Griffith, has command of the all-star Mutual studios. W. Bob Holland, widely known as newspaperman, humorist, lecturer, and publicist, formerly assistant managing editor of the American Press Association's news syndicate, and now managing editor of the Newspaper Feature Service, joined the Mutual publicity forces on May 18. Helen Starr, who has done much good work for Vogue and the New York Herald, has just been added to the Mutual staff. Marion Savage is another capable member, as is Robert S. Doman, formerly of the New York Evening Sun. Frank J. Wilstach looks out for the press work of "The Life of Villa," now playing at the Lyric Theater, New York. Mr. Wilstach is one of the best known theatrical press agents in this country. He has successfully handled the advertising of Sothern and Marlowe, of William Faversham, Viola Allen and De Wolf Hopper. Albert S. LeVino, newspaperman and magazine writer, formerly of the New York Times and the New York American, has been appointed city editor.

W. Bob Holland.

With this staff, Mr. Mindil is enabled to supply for the Mutual Film Corporation a class of copy that is not equalled in any other publicity department anywhere, and with newspaper speed or the more leisurely habit of the magazines. In addition to a prolific and thoroughly systematized publicity service, this department produces each week three publications, "Mutual Movie Fillers," "Reel Life," a forty-four page magazine, and a new woman's publication of sixteen pages, entitled "Our Mutual Girl Weekly."

"Jane, The Justice" (Beauty Film)

Reviewed by James S. McQuade.

MANY hearty, healthy laughs will greet the presentation of "Jane, the Justice," wherever given. Even the most valiant suffragette will be forced to divest herself of her sterner moods and still more direful fighting equipment when she views Margarita Fischer in the role of a "justicess" for a day or more.

Harry Pollard, producer and writer of the scenario of this mery skit, has introduced a bunch of comical situations, not one of which palls on one's visible faculties—at least that was my experience. Mr. Pollard has the virtue of sparing one the ancient saws and complexities that grieve the soul by pulling Laughter from his throne. He contrives to bring us something new from his laugh-factory, something that is food for merriment without overstepping the bounds of good taste.

The satire of the contrast between Jane's first case and her second, though somewhat extravagant, is well worthy of a good, merry laugh. In the first case a good looking young man is brought in by her father, the constable, charged with discharging firearms on forbidden grounds. Jane fines him five dollars and sets him free. A chicken thief appears in the second. The prisoner is brought before the court, but the Justice cannot be found. A boy informs the constable that Jane is spooning with a young man in the park. There the constable finds her in sweet converse with the young man who figured in her first case. He drives the young lover away at pistol point and drags Jane to the court. There she sentences the unfortunate thief to ten years at hard labor!

Taking Over Office Scene from "Jane the Justice" (Beauty).

The young man in the case so plans that he is again arrested and brought before the Justice, the constable announcing to the waiting crowd that the case must be tried behind closed doors.

How the constable takes the case out of the hands of the Justice and jails him; how the prisoner is released and becomes the husband of the Justice, she herself performing the ceremony, and how the constable is imprisoned until he gives his consent and takes the happy pair to his arms are mirthfully told in the pictures. The release date is May 26.

ANOTHER KALEM RELEASE.

The Kalem Company has decided to issue another single-reel release to its program. The extra subject will appear on Tuesday of each week beginning June 16, the first picture being entitled "The Missing Jewels." Adelaide Lawrence, the seven-year-old actress, is featured in this subject. The additional reel will build the Kalem program up to two two-reel subjects, Monday and Wednesday; two one-reel subjects, Tuesday and Saturday, and the Marshal Nielan comedies issued on Fridays.

OBSERVATIONS

BY OUR MAN ABOUT TOWN

THE people connected with the moving picture interests have at last awakened to the necessity of quick and decisive action on their part to properly present the claims in opposition to the Federal Censorship movement at Washington. During the past ten days active preparations in that direction developed in many quarters, but steps should be taken through the country without delay. The hearing at Washington will soon draw to a close and there is much in the hands of the committee to be offset by those affected by the proposed Federal enactment.

One of the best suggestions thus far made in behalf of the opposition is to get every producing company, state rights man, renter and exhibitor to write letters of protest to the senators and congressmen from their respective districts, and get their patrons and employees to do the same. Letters should also be sent direct to the House Committee on Education, to guard against any lapse of memory on the part of senators or congressmen.

This system of forwarding letters and petitions is perfectly fair and legitimate, despite the claim of some who are urging the Federal bill that it is coercive and does not represent the true sentiment of the signers. Moreover, it is only a counterpart of the measures already adopted by the people responsible for the framing of the Smith-Hughes Censor Bill. The system is one used for a long time by the so-called reformers to intimate to the legislators that their movements are backed by a strong following of voters and those having influence with them, and legislators are practically warned of substantial opposition they will meet in the future if they turn down the so-called reform measures placed before them. The Federalists, we may call them, will, of course, deny this, but their denial will not alter the facts. A display of political strength is always made in such matters and the motion picture people will never have a better opportunity than the present one in which to show how far their strength goes in civic affairs.

It is not contended that the display on one side or other can affect the merits of the bill. But when the professional reformers go before the lawmakers with the argument that their pet schemes represent the sentiment of a majority of the real factors in everything that tends to good government it is time that the moving picture people step forward and show the lawmakers who they are and how far they figure from a numerical standpoint.

In almost every instance movements to control and censor moving pictures in this country have originated with the clergy and church organizations. In fact, a case cannot be recalled in which the initiative has not come from that source. It is for this reason that the picture people have frequently been unable to evoke a full expression of honest sentiment regarding the claims made against the business. Respect for the clergy and the church has, in the past, made thousands of people delicate about taking a definite stand in favor of the pictures. But, as in many other notable affairs, most of these people have been forced to a confession of their honest conviction, and hundreds of ministers and church people have become supporters of the pictures, through the radical and unjust tactics of the professional agitators. Their methods have been so impregnated with prejudice and a spirit of persecution and annihilation that they fall short of operations in the dark ages only in the matter of sacrificing human life. The motion pictures have a great majority of the law-abiding people with them, and those in the business should act quickly to show it by their letters and petitions.

In discussing the suggestion that has been made to the motion picture interests relative to writing letters to the senators and congressmen a speaker was challenged a few nights ago to specify a known instance when the reform element used influences outside the tribunals, or law-making assemblages. He was quickly supplied with the information that when an unjust, but unsuccessful measure, was before the Board of Aldermen of Greater New York and the Mayor, some of the people who are now active in the campaign at Washington made personal appeals to church congregations and at meetings of societies connected with the churches for the members to personally see the aldermen of their respective districts, or write them, and urge their support of the measure then under consideration.

If those who have so persistently harped on the censorship of films would show a disposition to be convinced by reason; if they would show some one trait to remove the now almost popular belief that they are hopelessly biased and can be influenced by no considerations other than their own; or if they would permit themselves to recognize that in the business they have so persistently attacked there are involved interests of the highest legitimacy and those concerned in them have not refused to obey the laws, or prevent the enactment of measures that are just; or if they could momentarily forget their self-purity and recognize that in the business there are people who are their equals from all standpoints—morally, or intellectually—then their efforts at so-called reformation would receive fair consideration at the hands of all concerned and much better results would be achieved.

But the condition of affairs makes it necessary that the motion picture people must fight fire with fire. The exhibitors and renters are in the best position to do real, good work. They are in direct touch with people throughout the country and should not fail to get to work at once.

Another good suggestion made is that headquarters be designated in the principal cities of the country for the preparation of sample letters and petitions to be forwarded to all renters and exhibitors. The idea is to enable the writers to express the proper sentiments concisely and forcibly and avoid the submission of communications so voluminous as to make them obviously valueless.

Conversation with the owner of a well-known booking agency on Broadway last week clearly showed that the radical reformers have constituents in the old line of theatricals as bitterly opposed to motion pictures as themselves, but much less harmless. Most of the influential theatrical people who played "nigger-in-the-wood-pile" in the days when the pictures were fighting for fair recognition are now in the game themselves, content to dwell with the modernized form of entertainment until the time comes, and it may some day, when they will be justified in going back into the old field.

The veteran booking agent said: "I'll tell you, boys, the pictures will soon be on the wane. They are there now. I do not say they will die out, but the feature end of it will. It will go back to the days of the one reel. The leading actors who are going into the picture game are making a big mistake. They can never get back on the stage and get the same money they did when they left it. Becoming a 'movie' man lowers his dignity. My heart bleeds every time I hear of a professional I used to book becoming an 'extra' in the game. Poor fellow! he walks blindly, and does not look to the future."

"But the picture game has cripped the theatrical business. What are the poor fellows to do? They must live," said a bystander.

"But he must think of the dignity attaching to his profession," retorted the manager, "I could buy a camera, hire a cameraman, get a few people together and make pictures that would bring me money; I could become rich. But my professional pride will not allow me to do that. I love the actor, but I love him only as the speaking actor. I want to see him in the flesh, see his face and hear his voice. The public will want the same thing again and those who desert to the picture ranks will regret it."

"You supply supers for motion pictures, do you not?"

"Yes, I do. What of it? I must do something until the professionals come back."

PURCHASES THEATER.

S. S. Range of Portland, Ore., has purchased the Venice theater at Erie, Pa., of M. Potter. Mr. Range has been in the moving picture business in the Rose City for the past seven years.

MARIETTA, PA., TO HAVE NEW HOUSE.

S. A. Acri, manager of the Central Hall Photoplay Theater, Marietta, Pa., is having plans drawn for a motion picture theater in Marietta, a town with a population of 2,200. The size of the auditorium proper will be 45 by 100 feet, and the structure is to be built of entirely fireproof material. In addition to the fifteen foot doors in the lobby, the theater will have six-foot exits. The appointments are to be up-to-date, and may be compared with any of the high class theaters in big cities. The estimated cost will be about $10,000.

Doings at Los Angeles.

MABEL NORMAND, the ever-popular Keystone girl, the queen of the movies, and auto race fiend, will be pitted against her film rival, Marie Dressler, here next Sunday at Ascot Park in a match race during the meet there. The two girls will drive the fastest racers in the west. Miss Dressler, comedy queen of the real stage, will pilot a 120-horsepower Fiat, while Mabel will drive her little bear-cat Stutz. The race promises to be an exciting affair.

Another moving picture concern has started work here. The Pasadena Film Producing Company is headed by T. A. Woods and H. H. Hawkins, who have selected a site in Pasadena and have started to build a big studio. Leon D. Kent, who was identified with Lubin, will produce the 3-reel features.

George Nettleton, who bought the Majestic Theater in Santa Monica from R. S. Sturgeon, was last week appointed chief of police of Venice, a sister city. This exhibitor will assume his duties as chief, and, at the same time, hold to the film business.

"Damon and Pythias" has been put off for a short time until Otis Turner has finished "The Suburban," a four-reel racing story with Herbert Rawlinson and Anna Little as the leading players. The story is by James Dayton, and carries with it many incidents found on the old horse-racing tracks.

A $7,000 theater and store building will soon be erected by Pauline I. de Longpre in Hollywood. The building will be of brick, with ornamental front. This is in the downtown section, and will add another good house to the list.

Francis Ford and Grace Cunard have gone to San Francisco for a week. They will return south to San Diego, doing some big scenes for their series.

Morgan Wallace, who is well known to theatrical people as the man who directed at the Burbank Theater here for some time, has lost himself to the film game and has signed with Mack Sennett as a director of Keystones.

Paul Willis, the lad who so admirably played the lead in "Little Kaintuck," the Vitagraph one-reel drama of the city and country, is a school boy, and, when not working in the pictures, he is busy studying "his lessons." His latest film is "Pore Folks," which is a human interest story of the poor people of this day. He plays the lead in this film, which is one of the best that he has been in.

"Universal Ike" Carney, who lately joined that company, has changed again. He had some misunderstanding with his director, and so his grease, paints and costumes are now in storage while the funny Ike is waiting to sign up with another aggregation.

"Robert Paddi, New Mexico." This is registered on the Frank Montgomery player list. It was put on last week by a young and handsome Indian who has come to work with "Monty" at the Kalem camp. He replaces Art Ortega, who recently left the company.

The P. A. L., or Photoplayer Authors' League, has done one good thing here. Russell E. Smith entertained some of the members at his Hollywood home last Thursday evening. The writers got together and had a good talk and a most pleasant evening was enjoyed. The first issue of "The Script" will be out May 15th. This is being looked forward to with much interest, both in the east and west.

Would you feel a bit squeamish if you were made to ride a bucking cayuse named "Suicide," who was a rip-snorter? Mabel Normand did that this week at the Broncho Studio. She went over a 100-foot bluff at Santa Monica in a picture, entitled, "Mabel's Nerve." Some new tricks in camera work were seen in this film.

Word comes from the "1915" city that Bosworth and his players are working full speed on "An Odyssey of the North." Hettie Gray Baker is about the only one left, except the laboratory people, and she is working hard on the scripts for the company. The travelers are stopping along the coast, doing little scenes here and there, and some fine new locations are found.

Roscoe Arbuckle, the "heavy" comedian with Keystone, is one of the most nimble footed men in the world. When a man weighing a quarter of a ton steals third base he is passing through the atmosphere at a pretty good clip. "Fat" did that at Sunday's game and won much applause for it.

A pioneer cameraman, G. Mackenzie, who turns the crank for J. P. McGowan at the Kalem camp, is an author. He wrote "Rambles in Many Lands," which is a condensed story of his travels around the sphere.

The Faust Company, a moving picture producing concern, has started work at a location here and has as its stars two little girls. This is the company that will put on grown-up dramas with child players. Little Miss Edna May Wilson, daughter of the director, is the leading lady, while Miss Eva Reed will also head a company. There are over forty children in the first picture.

After a short rest, the Albuquerque Company has resumed operations on the hill and will start a three-reel western, "The Lust of the Redman," with Dot Farley in the leading role.

Buck Connors has invested in a motor. Nearly every picture player owns a machine, for the roads here are so smooth and slick that the temptation cannot be resisted.

"Sheriff" Arthur Mackley, directing a picture in which Vesta Pegg was supposed to fall over a cliff and go bumping twenty feet down, was surprised to see the actor go on down the other hundred feet, and still be alive. The poor man suffered a bad shaking up and numerous bruises.

Douglas Gerrard, known to his intimates as "Jerry," was the inimitable master of toasts at the Wednesday evening fellowship dinner at the Photoplayers. He had some new entertainments to amuse the assemblage, and they were amused, too. Jerry was "Shannon" in the big Kalem film, "Shannon of the Sixth."

* * *

Johnnie Brennan, eternal laugh maker, who scored a home run in "Hiram's Hotel," has ordered and is expecting to receive shortly, a car from France. He mentioned the name, and it sounded like "Pannier," or something like that.

* * *

F. A. Wall, scenario editor of American, informs writers that that company is not placing as many Westerns as formerly. However, anything suitable for Harry Pollard and Margarita Fischer will be welcomed.

Director Ulysses Davis has just completed an interesting western drama in which Margaret Gibson is supposed to escape from a barn, and, in sliding down a knotted rope, she slipped and burned her hands, beside suffering a few bruises when she alighted on the hay-covered floor. Davis will start a city story this week with Jane Novak in the leading role.

The Broncho constellation department has been robbed of its stars for a short time, every one being in the city to help produce "Mr. Alladin," the play that is being produced at one of the theaters. The story was written by Thomas Ince, and is a good one.

Ford Sterling is working in pictures now, and, at the same time, managing his company. Fred Balshofer is busy attending to the business end. Robert T. Thornby is a regular juvenile teacher or diplomat. He is doing another of his special "kiddie" series, with the little ones, and has to manage them. When he went to the beach at Santa Monica recently with the automobile loaded to the fenders with young America, and they saw the miniature railway, Mr. Director pretty near lost his "company." Between ice cream cones and balloons, however, he keeps them together long enough to shoot a few scenes.

Now that a permanent release has been secured for Balboa Features, both H. M. and E. D. Horkheimer and the rest of the people at the beach studio are going at their work harder than ever. Henry Otto is busy with a good play, and Bert Bracken is also doing a new one. This studio is one of the most lively on the coast. If the building activities were not so large, and there was not so much going on, a detailed account might be easily given. The place is a regular den of business, busy business, too. Everyone is working hard, and together. That's what makes good pictures.

Thomas H. Ince, of Bronchoville, who wrote and produced "Mr. Alladin" at the Majestic Theater here on the 10th, has been besieged with many compliments on the new play, which found a good place among the theater-going public of Los Angeles. The whole production has been staged and directed by the manager of the moving picture studio, and, with the help of some of the talented members of the film company, the play has been made quite a success. The cast includes J. Barney Sherry, A. L. Jarrett, Walter Edwards, J. Frank Burke, George Osbourné, Frank Borage, Walter Belasco, Florence Malone, Mary Merche, Elizabeth Burbridge, Ramona Radcliffe, Enid Markey and others equally as well known.

CLARK IRVINE.

German Censorship.

New Act for Kingdom of Wuertemberg Which Goes Into Effect in July.

FREDERIC WILLIAM WILE, Berlin correspondent of the Chicago Tribune, has contributed an interesting article on a new censor act for films in Germany, which appeared in the Tribune's issue of Sunday, May 10th. Mr. Wile states that this, the first national law yet enacted anywhere for the regulation of moving pictures, is not an imperial statute, covering the entire country, having been passed by and for the kingdom of Wuertemberg only. He states that it is generally regarded a model of its kind, and one which is likely to be the pattern not only for other German states, but for countries all over the world.

The act will come into force July 1st, this year. It is based on the theory that moving pictures require government supervision, in the interests of both public health and public morals. Great emphasis is laid on the protection of the morals of children. The authorities charged with the administration of the act include the local police administrations, and the national departments of health, education and religion. Transgressors of the act may be fined or jailed, or both. The translation of the act, as given in Mr. Wile's article, is as follows:

Only such films may be used in public moving picture theaters as have been inspected and approved by the local branch of the department of the interior. In so-called exhibitions for young people, only pictures may be shown which have been specially approved for such purpose.

The department of the interior can permit the exhibition, without special inspection, of films already approved by other police authorities, in case satisfactory evidence of such approval is furnished.

Scientific and Educational Films Excepted.

The department of the interior can also make exceptions, which shall free certain picture exhibitions from the requirement to comply with this act, in case of pictures intended to serve scientific or educational purposes.

Permission to exhibit films shall be withheld when their public display, owing to the events depicted or the manner in which they are depicted, is designed to endanger the health or morals of spectators, to offend religious susceptibilities, to outrage or agitate the feelings or sentiments of the public, or in any way to lower respect for law, order and morality.

Permission to exhibit films is also to be withheld when their display is likely to have an especially disadvantageous effect upon the eyes of spectators.

No film intended for exhibition before young people shall be approved if it is not fit for persons under 17 years of age.

Exhibitor Can Apply For Expert Testimony.

Pictures which are objectionable on account of only a comparatively minor section of the film may be approved on condition that the objectionable portion is eliminated.

Permission to display a film can be withdrawn in case objectionable features are discovered only after permission has been granted.

Local authorities shall have the right to call in experts before whom films must be displayed before granting permission for their public exhibition. Such expert opinion is in every case to be sought when the person desiring to exhibit a film asks for expert judgment, or in case of doubt as to whether a film is fit for exhibition before young people. If the local authorities refuse to approve a film, the person desiring to exhibit it shall be given opportunity to apply for expert testimony.

The experts will be selected by the department of the interior in co-operation with the departments of religion and public instruction.

Exhibitions For Minors.

Proprietors of moving picture theaters must notify the local police authorities in good time of all films which it is intended to display. If it is desired to give exhibitions for young people, this must be explicitly stated, and the time when such exhibitions begin, as well as the pictures therein to be displayed, must be fully described.

The police authorities will give theater proprietors written certificates of approved films.

The local police authorities may demand a display of films before officials of the community or experts, either in advance of their public exhibition or at any subsequent time.

Local Conditions Control Issue of Permits.

Permission to exhibit a picture in any individual community may be specially withheld by the police authorities of local conditions justify the belief that the exhibition of such a picture is designed to imperil public order through its effect on spectators.

Persons under seventeen years of age shall not be permitted to attend anything but so-called exhibitions for youths.

Such exhibitions shall be so described in all public advertisements and on plainly visible signs at the entrance of the place of exhibition, and may not last longer than 8 o'clock in the evening. Moving picture exhibitions in which other films than those sanctioned for exhibitions for youths may not be advertised as exhibitions for youths or in any other way so described.

Certain Hours For Minors' Exhibitions.

In exceptional cases, the hour after which pictures may not be displayed to young people may be altered by the police authorities. It shall also be permissible to issue further regulations for the protection of young persons against immoral or unhealthy film exhibitions.

In displaying films, theater proprietors must, invariably, describe pictures by the titles as approved by their permits. Permits must be kept ready for display at any and all times to officials charged with the duty of supervising film exhibitions.

The title of a picture may not be changed after it has once been approved by the authorities.

Theater proprietors are required to admit to their exhibitions at any and all times officials or experts bearing police credentials.

Violations Punished by Fine, Arrest, and Confiscation of Films.

Fees shall be collected by the department of the interior through local authorities for inspection of films.

Expense of securing expert evidence shall be borne by persons desiring to give public exhibitions of films.

All advertising matter relating to films or film exhibitions is to be forbidden by the local police authorities if it is of a character likely to effect the public mind in the sense described in this act.

Persons who have been refused the right to exhibit films shall have the right of appeal. It is hereby understood that the intent of the law is that a person whose film has been banned shall have his appeal decided with all due promptness, either at the hands of the superior police authorities of the district or the department of the interior.

Violations of the provisions of this act will be punished by fines up to 150 marks ($37.50) or by arrest.

In case of violation of this act, punishment will include not only the fine and arrest referred to herein, but also the confiscation of the film or films in question, whether the property of the convicted person or not.

Proprietors of motion picture theaters are liable to punishment, if they know, or according to the circumstances must assume, that any spectators are not yet seventeen years old.

In case of violations of this act, every individual display of a film shall be punished as a special, independent misdemeanor, even if the various films are connected with one another and represent a complete exhibition or performance.

Velma Whitman.

THE Old South, with all its gracious charm and delightful chivalry, has a worthy representative on the great staff of Lubin players, in the person of Miss Velma Whitman. Very much of a southern girl is this popular player, for her full name is Velma Virginia Whitman. She was born in the grand old city of Richmond. Like so many of the players who have made film productions notable, Miss Whitman had a thorough course of training in the "legitimate" before taking up the silent drama.

Velma Whitman.

For some time, Miss Whitman was associated with Corse Payton in stock. Her admirable work under the direction of this noted producer of the legitimate attracted the attention of Henry Miller, distinguished playwright and actor. As a result, Mr. Miller featured Miss Whitman for a season as the lead in that notable play, "The Servant in the House."

Miss Whitman has been engaged in moving picture work for about a year. During that entire time she has been at the head of one of the companies at the Lubin Western Branch in Los Angeles, Cal.

Versatility is one of her strong points. She may be a western girl one week, a Mexican senorita the next, then an Indian maid or a society girl. In all her work she has the happy faculty of portraying type and atmosphere.

Again, she has leads of courage, an asset that is so necessary in many phases of photoplay endeavor. She has been carried through a raging mass of flames, has calmly jumped into a lake and stayed under to register innumerable footage in the form of bubbles on the surface, has risked her life in a mad dash on a real runaway horse, has stood over an exploding gasoline stove with the result that her clothing accidentally caught fire. And the next time something spectacular is on the bill, Miss Whitman will be ready to play her part to the limit.

Miss Whitman's attractive personality, her beauty and her capabilities as an actress have won her countless friends and admirers in all parts of the world.

So satisfactory has been her work that she has just been re-engaged by the Lubin Western Branch. During the present year Miss Whitman will play the leads in a notable series of multiple-reel productions, with the incomparable natural beauties of the Golden State as a background.

Moving Picture Educator

THE NEW SCENARIOS.

The Industrial.

FOR all classes of educational purposes the scenarios are not written, they are not wrought out of ideas or imagination, they are revealed. Taken direct from life, they are at once correct, instructive and inspiring. The living picture is taken from the living, for the livng; for life is the greatest teacher. In industrial pictures there is a growing demand and use for such pictures as shall best teach at once, the best, cheapest and the easiest way of doing things; this is in the war for efficiency and economy. It is for this purpose that the industrial world is finding in the moving picture the solution of problems that have troubled them for many years, it is the one desired power to show that which all have wanted to see—how to do things.

From time to time the Educator has recorded how various manufacturers are using the moving picture in their manufactories for the purposes above indicated. In the automobile world, the management of the Reo Motor Car Company, after a thorough investigation in the matter, has decided that efficiency can be greatly increased with the aid of films along industrial lines, it has therefore purchased a moving-picture outfit. Pictures will be taken of the plant, as also pictures of any scenes and conditions which are or may be connected with the making or use of automobiles. These films are to be of a three-fold use. They will be shown regularly to the employees, while duplicates will be used for sales purposes, and others will be designed for the general public in an advertising manner. Surely nothing else can be put to such an all around useful and profitable purpose; the Reo Company is only doing what many enterprising people are doing.

The Commercial.

The commercial world is filled with associations having the sole object of perfect salesmanship in view. While recognizing the value of the human agency, man, with all his perfections, finds also that he has many deficiencies, among these are the inability to adequately set forth by word of mouth, or by simple illustration, those things which as a salesman he wishes to bring to the notice of the desired purchaser. The moving picture has brought the factory with all its products right to the office or store of buyer, who with a new intelligence can now become thoroughly familiar with whatever he desires. Many organizations, such as Retailers' Associations and Business Men's Leagues and Commercial Travelers' Organizations are, according to the many reports in the daily papers from all parts of the country, now using the motion picture to familiarize themselves and their clients with their commodities. Thus their scenarios are already written for them in their everyday affairs, nothing being left to, or desired from the outside world; commercial kinematography writes its own scenarios. The latest instance of this is furnished by the Lehigh Portland Cement Company, which has had films made of all the processes through which the raw materials pass until they combine to form the famous Lehigh Cement; the sales and advertising department of the company affirm that great commercial advantage will result from the exhibitions thus prepared.

Agricultural and Horticultural.

Nowhere has the moving picture found its own scenarios more ready at hand than in nature. Apart entirely from natural history, nature, as the servant of man, has by experience and growing scientific cultivation, become one of the greatest and most necessary parts of man's existence. To-day it is not possible for a State Agricultural Fair or Horticultural Show to meet without an exhaustive display of living pictures to enhance the value of greater nature training. The majority of state colleges are equipped for advanced training with pictures of nature's own scenarios. Farmers and gardeners' institutes are also following similar lines, as are also the park systems of the cities of the country. In Ohio a lecturer is touring the state with moving picture lectures along these lines. The mayor of Cleveland speaks of them as being "the most educational he had been privileged to attend."

Health and Hygiene.

While for some time the public health has been helped by the use of films dealing with tuberculosis, care of teeth, the deadly house fly, and many other valuable aids to public welfare, there is no doubt but that the best results are yet to be secured, because of the great interest being displayed by the U. S. Government. Under the direction of Assistant Surgeon-General William C. Rucker, the United States Public Health Service has entered significantly into the motion picture business. This official is an advocate of the usefulness and teaching quality of cinematography and he means to develop this branch of the service to the fullest extent. In an interview with General Rucker he was most enthusiastic on this subject.

"It is my plan to popularize public health and hygiene in all walks of life," he said, "and the most effective means of accomplishing this end is through the motion picture. At present I have at my disposal a mile of film which presents subjects and problems which interest some and assist others. A part of this gives a concise account of the work now in progress, containing many scientific and instructive topics that may be carried into homes, hospitals, and colleges.

"The problems that confront the big hygienic laboratory of the nation at Washington are touched upon. The examinations necessary for the sale of antitoxins, serums, and vaccines in interesting traffic tell the story of Uncle Sam's caution in this direction. This is in itself so vast a subject that it will be given greater details in future reels.

"The experiments at the Baby Milk Station will interest everyone, especially the feminine public. Comparative tests for feeding infants have furnished statistics of vital importance, for the nation recognizes the fact that the children of to-day mean the backbone of the future nation.

"One of the most interesting films which the Public Health Service has secured is that which depicts the arrival and quarantine of immigrants at Ellis Island. Special emphasis is laid upon the caution with which Uncle Sam safeguards his ports against contagious diseases from foreign lands.

"Co-equal with this care is the kindness with which the immigrants are treated, especially the children. The wholesome food, the hygienic surroundings, and the humane considerations tendered these strangers in a strange land have made our country an asylum for the poor and oppressed.

A film which tells the housekeeper how she may assist in health and hygiene condition is that of the bubonic plague. It pictures the house rat at work, causing the spread of this pest and showing how these messengers of contagion may be decreased by the covering of garbage and refuse, by doing away with trash piles, and by keeping clean the dark, damp corners, as the rat is the carrier of the bubonic plague. It pictures the rat at work, causing the spread of this pest, and shows how these messengers of contagion may be decreased by the proper covering of garbage and refuge, by doing away with trash piles and keeping clean the dark, damp corners. As the rat is the carrier of the bubonic plague, so the ground squirrel perpetuates the dread disease. The film also tells of means for eradicating this bothersome earth animal, whose decrease has already been found beneficial to San Francisco.

The Educative Force in London.

At the second annual dinner of the Cinematograph Exhibitors' Association of Great Britain and Ireland, held recently in London, Mr. Ellis Griffith, M. P., said that he thought there was an immense future for the moving picture industry and that its educative force had not yet been quite appreciated, yet he looked forward to the day when it would play a considerable part in that direction. Dr. R. T. Jupp said the cinema was the working-man's theater, and was the cleanest, most harmless, and in a broad sense the most educative form of popular amusement the world had ever seen. Reports were made showing that 7,000,000 people paid admission weekly to the more than 5,000 theaters. The capital of the industries totaled about $350,000,000, while last year 544 new companies were registered, representing a capital of nearly $15,000,000.

WORKS IN OPPOSITION TO HERSELF.

Even in these days of keen theatrical competition, it is rather unusual for a performer to be billed as a counter-attraction against herself. This, however, was the situation which prevailed in Pittsburg a few weeks ago.

Mlle. Verna Mersereau, a prominent danseuse, was the headline attraction at a local vaudeville house. At the same time, "The Dance of Death," a two-part Kalem drama in which Miss Mersereau was featured, was being shown at the Lyric, one of Pittsburgh's largest photoplay houses which is located on Fifth avenue. Furthermore, despite the fact that the danseuse's name was posted in flaring electric lights in front of the vaudeville theater, "The Dance of Death," played to capacity houses and "turned 'em away."

In a letter written by Miss Mersereau to a friend in New York City, the charming danseuse declares she discovered that she was in competition against herself, upon her arrival in the Smoky City early Monday morning. Deciding to see herself in the Kalem drama before her act went on the vaudeville theater, Miss Mersereau hastened around to the Lyric at 11 A.M.

"But," jokingly complains the actress, "although I reached the Lyric in time for the first performance I found that the house was filled and that I would have to wait. It was only after I had appealed to the manager and revealed my identity that I was allowed to enter. At that time, there was a large crowd waiting in line outside for the next performance."

"I went back to the Lyric after I had finished at the theater that night and again found the house filled to capacity. I now have something unique to brag about," Miss Mersereau jokingly concludes. "I am probably the only performer who has ever appeared as a counter-attraction against herself."

CENTRAL PHOTOPLAY AGENCY OPENS OFFICES.

The Central Photoplay Agency has opened offices in the Leader-News Building, Cleveland, Ohio. The company is composed of Abe Resler, Charles W. Bradley and Fred Held. The first picture to be handled by the Central will be "Fire and Sword," the big six-reel melodrama, for which production it has the Ohio rights. It is the intention of the company to deal in features only, "the bigger the better." Mr. Held will represent the company in New York City, and will shortly open offices here.

TOM SANTSCHI'S GUIDE TO SUCCESS.

Thomas Santschi, leading man and one of the new directors of the Selig Stock Company in California, highly esteemed the friendship of the late Kyrle Bellew, who in his day was the very prince of romantic acting, and whose wide range of accomplishment made him a man among men. Mr. Santschi treasures the advice he gave to him as a young player, as most significant stepping-stone to success.

"Affectation is the chain that binds the average actor to mediocrity."

"Stage tricks are fascinating weapons with which to fight for public approval, but they are boomerangs rather than sure-shot rifles."

"An actor of inferior native talent will triumph over his clever colleagues if he develops with more regard for art than to bluff."

"Repressed emotion has become banal as a phrase, but it nevertheless indicates a stage method of the future."

"The actor can gain ten-fold sympathy from his audience by struggling against his tears and against his weakness rather than feeling sorry for himself."

"Never should an actor convey to an audience the suggestion that he is either looking at himself or listening to his own voice with fondest appreciation."

"The actor should carefully discriminate between two attitudes—conceit and dignity—the one is destructive, the other constructive."

Advertising for Exhibitors

Conducted by EPES WINTHROP SARGENT

Be Tickled.

MOST of you expect to be in the business a year from now and most of you will. Why not get a tickler? A tickler is a memory jog. Take the recent "Mother's Day," for example. It comes every year. Herewith we offer the first (and we hope not the only) advertising reference to "Mother's Day." It is sent in by D. J. Small, of the Wizard Theater, York, Pa. Apart from the top line there is nothing to advertise the house. The fact that there is nothing but that line makes the advertisement all the better. It is the advertisement of Mother's Day and not the Wizard Theater, and the modest restraint is the better taste and the better advertisement.

Here is the stuff:

Compliments of the "WIZARD" Theater.
MOTHER'S DAY
Sunday, May 10th.

"Honor thy father and thy mother, that thy days may be long the land which Jehovah thy God giveth thee."

"Live this day, and every day as your mother would have you live it."

Wear the emblem—the white carnation—its whiteness stands for purity; its form, beauty; its fragrance, love; its wide field of growth, charity; its lasting qualities, fidelity.

So here's to the white carnation,
Wear it on Mother's Day;
Flower that blooms for mother,
Winsome, gallant and gay.
Flower of perfect sweetness,
Flower of hut and hall,
Here's to the white carnation,
And to mother—Our Best of All.

While walking down a crowded city street the other day,
I heard a little urchin to a comrade turn and say:
"Say Jimmie, don't yer know I'd be as happy as a clam,
If I only was the feller that my mudder t'inks I am."
"She t'inks I am a wonder and knows her little lad
Would never mix with nottin, dat was ugly, mean, or bad.
I often sit and t'ink how nice t'would be gee, whiz,
If a feller was de feller dat his mudder t'inks he is."

So, folks, be yours a life of toil, or undiluted joy
You still can learn a lesson from this small unlettered boy;
Don't try to be an earthly saint, with eyes fixed on a star
Just try to be the fellow that your mother thinks you are.

File Ideas.

Get some large envelopes from your stationer, about a nine by twelve inch manila or craft. Mark one "New Years" the next "St. Valentine," then "Lincoln's Birthday," "Washington's Birthday," and so on through all the holidays, general and purely local, down to Christmas. Date them as well as label them and put them in proper order in the big drawer of your desk, an empty envelope box, or anything of that sort. Into each of these put any idea of any sort that is applicable to the day. On January second put the New Year's envelope at the back of the pile and the next will face you, and so on through the year. If you hear of some particularly local celebration, be in a hurry to get that in its proper place and get something to put in it, even if you have to write the matter yourself. Then you'll always be ready for the coming event and have timely and appropriate matter. This year put in the stuff next year, clipped from this department or anywhere else you can get it, and next year put in the stuff for 1916.

Make something of the special days, any special day and every special day. Make people realize that you are up to date through your hustle on the special days and you'll get credit for always being up to date. If the war talk lasts over, remember that it was on July 3 that the Spanish fleet was destroyed. There must be some of the Edison, Vitagraph or Biograph films left. See if you can dig them up. Make a special feature of them. It is too late to remember the Maine, but we can remember Santiago. If you are down South get Melies Alamo picture on that anniversary. If you are a California exhibitor, there is a lot of stuff you can dig out of the junk for Native Sons' day. Keep just a little ahead of the times and get credit for being on the jump. This is an age of hustle. Keep more than abreast of the times. Lead the rest. It will be easy if you plan to start a year ahead of the rest, and it is easy to keep that far ahead.

Sounds Sincere.

The New Family Theater, Adrian, Mich., sends us a life pass to the house. We are sorry that it takes too much carfare to get there and back, but we note a couple of nice lines on the pass. They read—

Not in payment, but in appreciation of Courtesies extended, you are Cordially Invited to spend Matinee as the Guest or Night of the
NEW FAMILY THEATRE.

To a hardened old dead-head that sounds a lot more inviting than the usual curt "Pass one."

E. M. Simons, the manager, sends in two pieces of advertising. One is a private post card addressed to the house and carrying on the reverse a request that the card be checked to indicate a preference for certain classes of film. The promise is made that the patron will be notified by mail when their preferences are to be shown. The classifications are Famous Players, Shakespearian, Scenic, Industrial, Current Events, Society Drama, Tragedy, Farce Comedy, Burlesque Comedy, Western, Military and Our Regular Bill. We think it would be interesting if Mr. Simons would tabulate the replies.

The other piece is a monthly calendar with the feature days in red. On the reverse the particulars of these days are given. It might save the second printing to box in the special dates or substitute an S for special or an F for feature on these days, but the idea is well marked and holding. The card may be tacked up for general reference and so be frequently consulted. We gather that this is a monthly feature and that each month is the text for a few lines of reading matter in which the month and the photoplay get well mixed. Here is the prose poem for May as a hint as to the style.

At Last a Start.

Denver has many handsome photoplay theaters and yet is widely known as a cheap town, all of the houses charging five cents and sticking to it. S. Barret McCormick, of the Rocky Mountain News, has been fighting long for an increased admission but it is only lately that his efforts have been crowned with success. The Princess announces Les Miserables at a ten and twenty cent rate. It looks like a small victory for the gallant fight McCormick has made, but it is a decisive victory none the less and before long Denver theaters will be getting what the subject is worth without reference to the fact that five cents used to be the standard price. If there were more men like McCormick on the daily papers, the general tone of the exhibition end would be infinitely better.

An Exhaustive Card.

P. E. Van Ripper, of New York, who does not tell what theater he manages, sends in a card he is using. This gives the name of the subject, the file number, the class, comment on the photography, the name of the author, producer and cameraman, the cast, the release date, the date of use in the theater, its age at that time, remarks and references to the trade press by volume, number and page. The file number refers to the folder file kept by the theater in which is to be found all matter dealing with the subject. Once the program is known it is the work of but a few moments to produce the files, look up the reports and be in complete possession of the facts. The card is almost too full in that the name of the camera man is hardly of much interest, but it is better to be over exact than without information at all. Mr. Van Ripper adds that before each subject is run he tells the story to the audience, and that they seem to like it, but it seems to us that this must destroy the suspense which the director ha been at some pains to create. If you have been told before hand that Jim rescues Nellie and just how he does it, it is hardly possible to get up a real good shudder when the wicked villain grabs her by the throat and swears she shall be hisn. Keep them guessing and you'll hold their interest.

Check Them Up.

When you get "dope" from the press agents check the stuff up. We note an item in the bulletin of the Third Street Theater, Scranton, which says that Tefft Johnson is to appear in a Vitagraph in which he rides to the 17th story of a New York Skyscraper on an iron beam. Then it tells what happens and adds "The distance above the ground where this extraordinary feat takes place is between five and six hundred feet." Even so! Say 500 feet. Seventeen goes into 500 twenty-nine times and seven over. We do not know of any New York or other skyscraper that averages 29 7/17 feet to the story. That sort of stuff hurts rather than helps your program. Check up on the press agent. Some of your readers will catch the breaks and blame you, not the press agent, for them.

Help!

The Princess theater, Chelsea, Mich., sends in a throwaway for Absinthe, the black type reading

Don't be Absinthe
From the Princess Theater
(The House of Quality)
Tonight—Tuesday

There are three boxes of small type matter in between. What can be done about a pun like that?

Mr. Scott Suggests.

L. J. Scott, of Warrensburg, Mo., commenting on the recent airdome story, suggests that it is better to build frames on the fence and provide these with doors, the paper being inserted back of the door. As we understand his sketch, he makes a frame against the wall large enough to contain a one, three or six or eight sheet as the case may be. Within this he makes a narrow door hinged at one side and caught by a button at the other. The paper is tacked up within this, the door serving to hold down the edges of the paper. We take it that the frames are not glazed, being merely a frame work of moulding. Where paper is hired and must be put up loose we think that two side sticks fitting snugly within the frame would be sufficient and still more simple. Where paper is tacked and not pasted, it would be well to put a rain shed over the top to keep the water from dripping down on the paper. The main point is to accustom the patron to look to one place for the day's program and another for the tomorrow and coming, to avoid confusion. Mr. Scott says he is going to fix up his arrdome. We hope that he sends a photograph of it. This is his enclosed house:

The right hand board gives the hours of performance and the one on the left the prices of admission.

Mr. Smith had a rather peculiar experience lately. He was running the Who Will Marry Mary series, and the sixth reel was burned before it came his turn to run it. After extended correspondence he procured the loan of the subject from the Omaha branch of the General Film and crowed a little over getting it at last.

For the Dove of Peace.

Mr. Scott also sends the first three issues of his house paper, and adds that a typewriter advertisement in one issue was run to pacify the printer, who went up in the air over some criticisms Mr. Scott felt he had to make. That's a new way for a printer to get free advertising.

The Gem News is a rather small sheet, 5½ by 7, but it has more reading matter than some of the more pretentious organs and it is not all clip stuff. Each issue carries a short column of plain talk headed Frank Facts in which house matters are discussed. One deals with the added cost of feature films and the necessity for raising prices on those days, another deals with music and good projection as unrealized adjuncts to the film and a third deals with the reason for the sheet. They are plain, unvarnished chats with the patrons about things that interest those patrons and they do the house infinitely more good than would a dozen pages of clipped matter with never a hint of the personal note. It is not so much how much you print as what you print. Clip to help out, by all means, but make your publication speak for you first, last and all the time; not in braggart vein, but in the intimate, explanatory way that best preserves the relation between manager and patron. This will suggest Mr. Scott's style:

A Gem Irregular said the other day, "Where you do you get this idea of charging ten cents Thursday, Friday and Saturday?"

Notice how he said it.

He did not ask if I was sure that the Gem patrons wanted more Feature films; nor did he even admit that there was a difference between the regular service and the expensive multiple reel productions we have been securing lately.

May be you had not considered this matter either.

"The Adventures of Kathlyn" cost $140,000 to produce.

We pay exactly three times as much rental on those films as we do on our regular service.

"An American King" and "Local Color," shown last Thursday, and, in fact, the films shown on any advertised Feature Day, cost us considerable more than our regular programs.

If this theater were packed from 2:30 p.m. until 10:30 p.m. it would be impossible to more than break even at 5 cents if the "Kathlyn" pictures were being shown.

You eat three times a day.

Why begrudge us a like living?

Any time you are dissatisfied with a Gem program your money will be gladly refunded.

Inside there is a running comment on the program for the week, but not the full story or how it ends, and the back page is reserved for news and chat.

Durn the Luck.

That Academian certainly does have its ups and downs. Now it is to be discontinued for three weeks to see if anyone misses it. Of course, it is only a delay of three weeks, but the sheet is too useful to the house to be shoved into the discard again for nearly a month.

A late issue takes up a new ventilating apparatus, pointing out that this delivers 35 feet of fresh air per minute for each person, which is one foot in excess of the requirements of the New York Health Board, and harks back to last fall when the Academian promised this installation before the summer came, driving home the fact that the house keeps its promises. Is's worth the price of two issues just to have the organ in which to drive home a punch like that.

Long and Narrow.

The Windsor Theater, Hampton, Iowa, uses a program only 3 inches wide against 8½ deep, which makes it easy to get the book out of any pocket or handbag. A better effect could be had were it enlarged into a six-sheet railroad-folder style, folding down the short length and getting a program almost three by six inches. This would give a front page, two pages for reading and three pages for programs. A program of extreme shape may attract attention, but if the measurement is awkward it will not be preserved for future reference. The advertising matter is well worded, but the style is against the sheet. It would be easy to change the folding and get double the value for the same money.

Mr. Russell says he enclosed stamps for a copy of the paper, but evidently neglected to do so.

Do You Know?

Lately the Rosemary Theater, Ocean Park, California, put out yellow slips reading:

Monday or Tuesday, April 13 or 14, pay bearer one 5-reel All Star Feature picture play, filmed from the famous Broadway success of Eugene Walters and produced by Augustus Thomas with members of the original Broadway cast, including Tully Marshall.

Charge to the account of Rosemary Theater.

Surcharged on this in red ink was the title "Paid in Full" in four-line letters that stood out vividly against the yellow paper. The entire printing was designed to give the effect of a bill or order of some sort to give force to the "Paid in Full." H. H. Raymond, of the house, writes that many came to the theater, thinking that the advertisement was a pass and that bets have been made as to whether or not the text constituted a pass. It was too palpably an advertisement to be confused as a pass by the knowing, but the matter is open to argument at that. It is a draft on the theater and is marked paid. In any event it made more than the usual talk and so fulfilled its purpose. It is a striking advertisement. There are some pseudo passes that might make trouble, but we do not think that this is in that class.

Playing Up the Music.

At the Cameraphone theaters they are now devoting a full page of the program space to the musical features, with the daily program and a chat by the organist on the features forming a part of the programs. This will arouse the interest in the musical program, though there is some danger of losing sight of the fact that the music is to support the effect of the picture and this is not possible where a selection must be played all the way through. The other night in a New York house, the organist started to play Chopin's Funeral March because it suited the opening of the picture and he kept on playing to the end, though the spirit of the picture had entirely changed. A good picture is bigger than a pipe organ.

Eliminating It Gradually.

T. O. Fleischbein, of the Diamond Theater, Cloquet, Mich., uses vaudeville because his patrons demand it, but has been able to eliminate that feature from the first half of the week through the use of features. In the long run he'll probably get rid of it altogether. He sends the first three issues of a new program he is getting out, one of which carries the "phonograph" matter that seems to have been about as widely used as any single piece of matter yet published. Will the Academian please take an encore? And by the same token will they please nail our name to that slippery mailing list.

Getting back to Michigan; the first and second issues carried some text, but the last issue is wholly display advertising, which is not so effective. At best but a column of reader was used. Give them something to read and they'll take it home to read it. One thing we notice is that postcards of the players are to be had merely for the asking. It would be better to use them as souvenirs on off nights and get something out of them above the popularity of the player. Postcards absolutely free are less valued than postcards that are given for some reason and a postcard of a different player every Friday night or on two nights a week would build up the business in dull times.

A New Function.

Eller Metzger, of the Casino, Des Moines, writes: "Our old friend Sergel, of the Rex Theater, Buhl, Idaho, is in town and joins me in sending best wishes. He and I were old friends until about five years ago when we lost track of each other until the Moving Picture World gave us a clue to each other's whereabouts, so we owe you another vote of thanks."

We didn't know that this department was reuniting lost friends, but we have known that the correspondence engendered through requests for exchange of programs has, in many cases, resulted in the formation of friendships between managers in widely separated parts of the country as well as bringing many good friends to us.

Mr. Metzger's letter was primarily to bring the first issues of his new house program. The first page carried the house program for the week and the second and third pages give the synopsis, but not clear down to the end of the picture. The first and fourth issues carry some house stuff in addition, but not enough. Just a program is better than nothing, but a program that makes friends is worth all the trouble it takes to write the original matter. Mr. Metzger has started right. Now we hope that he builds up on the good commencement by sounding the personal note in every issue. He is cheating himself if he does not.

Springs Another.

E. G. Dunlevy, who was the first to string a weekly calendar showing where the favorites could be found, has built up on this idea in his motion picture department in the Lancaster Intelligencer. He has added a calendar showing which house will show the numerous serial pictures and on what day. Here is the idea:

SERIAL PICTURES

We give below a list of serial pictures of which installments will be shown in Lancaster this week. This guide will be given out weekly.

Monday, Wonders, "Daisy of the Dailies," Fifth.
Monday, Wonders, "The Adventures of Kathlyn," Ninth.
Tuesday, Grand, "The Pearls of Panama," Second.
Tuesday, Hipnodrome, "Our Mutual Girl," Fifteenth.
Wednesday, Keen, "The Adventures of Ardo," Fourth.
Thursday, Scenic, "Lucile Love," Third.
Saturday, Wonders, "The Man Who Disappeared," Second.

THE PHOTOPLAYWRIGHT

Conducted by EPES WINTHROP SARGENT

Frontier Facts.

RECENTLY Karl R. Coolidge, of the St. Louis Motion Picture Company sat down to drop us a few lines and here's his very note:

> I regret to report that our comedy company has suddenly been discontinued, and that consequently we are not at present in the market for comedy photoplays. This is certainly unfortunate, as your note in the World has brought in a flood of scripts. However, such things can't be helped. About five months ago you ran an item for us stating your wants. This brought us in connection with a number of good writers, but the majority of the stuff is so hopless that sometimes I think it is hardly worth while to read outside scripts. We want now only Westerns, small cast, "Go get the sheriff" style. In the future when authors submit stories that are entirely out of our line I am going to ask them to see at least three of our dramas, and to study that same number of synopses in the World. From what I know of conditions in the West Coast studios, I can say that the market never was better for photoplaywrights, but its about time that something was done to eliminate the hit or miss writers who are spoiling things for the conscientious. I think that if writers knew how eagerly their scripts were searched for something new that they would be a little more careful with their work. Certain people might feel much encouraged if they knew that our dramatic director, Mr. Robards, often asked if any new scripts had come in from them. Others, I have an idea, would sit up and take notice if they heard their efforts termed junk.
> By the way, I wish you would dig into the people who send pathetic letters with their scripts. I can't for the world see why a letter is at all necessary if the "Usual Rate" item is on the script. It makes me feel as though the author figures that I haven't enough brains to know that a script is submitted for sale unless a letter to that effect is sent.

Now here is a letter from an editor. He tells how the scripts are watched in the hope of finds. He tells how the work of certain writers of promise is being watched in the hope that they'll keep their promises. He tells how sorely they are tempted to throw overboard the mass of junk and look only to the proved writers.

What Mr. Coolidge writes is what every real editor of photoplays could write. Each studio has certain writers who have caught the style of that studio. There are certain other writers who suggest that in the long run they might get the idea. There are several tons of plain junk shot into the studio without reference to the style of production of that particular company or anything else.

The St. Louis makes Frontier films. "Frontier" films should suggest the frontier days of the West. The productions suggest that . If you can't get that suggestion, please curl up and die. Frontier is one of the few companies that is self explanatory, and it does not want a story of how Gwendolyn the banker's daughter loved and married Jim, the poor but honest policeman. Such things seldom happen on the Frontier for the excellent reason that banks and policemen are alike lacking. If you can't take a wide open hint like "Frontier," what gives the idea you have sense, anyhow? Half the trick lies in writing acceptable plays. The other half the trick is sending them to the places where they are acceptable.

The Pittsburgh Inquest.

Here is the report of Frank Howard Clark, of the Pittsburgh Inquest. If you live in Pittsburgh, or are willing to travel fifty miles, like Mrs. Reed, we have Mr. Clark's address and will be glad to slip it into a return envelope for you.

Pittsburgh's Inquest Circle became a reality when, on the evening of Thursday, May 7th, we assembled with the following membership: Mrs. Ruby Myer Reed, Port Vue, Pa.; Mrs. Anna H. McGovern, Erie, Pa.; Mrs. Mayta Hammond, Oil City, Pa.; Miss Nella Robinson, Mrs. Annette Johnson, Mrs. Margaret Keller, Miss Bee M. Aarons, John E. Kevan, Wm. F. Aglett, J. A. Painter, B. Morgenthau, E. W. Matlack, and Frank Howard Clark, of Pittsburgh. Not so bad for a beginning—what? And nicely balanced at that—seven women and six men—and all earnest and enthusiastic, which means much for the success of our organization. Call it the "thirteen" club, if you will, but the fact remains, nevertheless, all are optimistic as to the results to be accomplished by our little crowd. Mrs. Reed came a distance of 50 miles by train and trolley in order to sit in at the meeting—which shows but the general spirit prevading the Circle.

After the first business of becoming acquainted we elected Mr. Matlack Coroner. He outlined the aims and purposes of the organization in an able address. Having worked along with a field company for awhile, he was in a position to impart same first hand knowledge and very good advice. A general talk among the members present then followed, each setting forth his or her experience at the game. Some confessed to being new while others admitted several years' experience with varying degrees of success. It developed that Mrs. Johnson is a noted magazine writer, that Miss Aarons has sold a number of scripts and that Matlack and the writer have placed over half a hundred. It is of course up to those who have "landed" to give the others the benefit of their experience that they may avoid the many obstacles and make easier for them the road to the final and much coveted goal—that for which we are all striving.

Many good "pointers" were exchanged during the course of the evening to the benefit of all. Several scripts were examined, discussed, dissected and "inquested" in good style. Many matters came up for discussion with divers expressions of opinion—many matters and details too numerous to mention, and at the conclusion of the evening's argument, all were willing to admit that their time had not been spent in vain.

Matlack and the writer are of the opinion that we have much promising "timber" within our little Circle and that with a little more "seasoning" will develop into finished writers of the first order. In fact, the majority are now turning out saleable stuff, but that they are not placing their scripts may be due to a hundred and one reasons, without discredit to or implying a lack of merit in their work. We are resolved that the editors will some day look to Pittsburgh as an available source of supply and that when that day arrives, we can feel that our Circle will not have been in vain. "Help one another"—that is our motto—and we will stick to the finish. As Mrs. McGovern of Erie remarked to the writer in a recent letter: "I am not egotistic—merely optimistic"—and that's the way we all feel about it—in other words, we are headed in the right direction imbued with the right spirit—and that means much for a good start.

Our future procedure will no doubt be to take in a show and later discuss it's merits or lack of same together with all matters relative thereto; also to read and compare several produced and unsold scripts—and a general discussion of all and any matters relative to photoplay work.

Taking Up the Work.

Two letters came in this week, one from a woman who wanted to know how to write photoplays because she had a story about Indians that had been a tradition in her family for generations. The other was from a man who had taken up writing because he was out of a job.

Neither has a proper excuse for taking up photoplay writing.

Photoplay writing has become as much of an art as the fiction or dramatic form. It must be studied and practised until facility is gained, and until then the chances of success are pitifully small. Several hundred writers are now at a stage where they are writing a better story than would have sold a few years ago, but which does not sell at present because the standards have been raised so high since then. Unless you are willing to work until you can come up to the new mark, drop it. Don't drag along selling a story every half year or so. Either dig in and work up to the new standard or drop out.

We have one personal pupil under observation who has been doing nothing but plotting for the past six months. It is tedious work and not remunerative, but when we let go of him he is going to be so used to plotting that he can't get stuck, and these months of hard, prosy work will then bear their fruit.

And in the meantime we've dropped several who are in such a hurry to sell that they have no time to study, and so they neither study nor sell.

Photoplay writing is not a toy. It is a serious study and not lightly to be undertaken.

Sales Agencies.

Photoplay sales agencies threaten to become even more of a nuisance to editors than the schools. Just the other day an "agent" called up to know whether to send the full script or just the synopsis to the editor. Seems to us that an experienced agent should know. Another agency in the western part of the state makes the statement that the bulk of the scripts are now sold through agencies, which is a distinct untruth. We know of four agencies that have sprung up within the past six weeks. You can sell to the same advantage as these self-styled agencies and presently you can sell to much greater advantage.

Quitting Time.

The very instant you stop keeping the audience guessing, it's time to stop your play.

Sound Sense.

Rev. Sydney S. Booth, now vacationing in England writes:

> I have recently sold two more scripts to Edison. I have a sub-conscious idea that in a previous letter I told you I was revamping some old rejected scripts. These two stories now sold were the first two I ever wrote; but now thoroughly re-written in the light of my further knowledge of the art. Not only that, but they each brought me an enhanced price over any others I had previously sold; $35 instead of $25. The point it this, that one should never throw away or lose anything that one has ever written. This is an old idea to most of us but I suspect that many who try to write have not tumbled to it yet. Another point I would make is this: that our first stories, written when we are green, have in them more original matter than we realize, and I feel sure this is because our sub-conscious minds are not clogged up with hundreds of the stories of the films which we have stored away and use without knowing we are pirating. I am afraid I put it rather clumsily but you will gather my meaning.

There is a lot of sense in this. Over and over again we hear the wail of an author who sold one or two of his first scripts and then failed to sell others. The first scripts had ideas. Then the author got mixed up with the technique of form and forgot to think ideas. Others have failed to sell purely through their inability to get their ideas over clearly. Later on, when practice has brought facility, they will find those ideas still as good as they were in the first place, and they will be better able to put them in such a form that some editor will share their conviction. Just the other day we wrote a man that some time he would sell a story that in its present form was imperfect, and he wrote back that Biograph had just made it, not from his script, but using much the same idea (No, Biograph had not seen his script) with the addition of professional development of that idea.

Keep the now despised stuff. It will come in handy some day.

Getting Plots.

A trained imagination is the author's most valuable asset, and yet so few writers train their imagination. Even old hands talk about the hard work of getting ideas, and the labor of plot formation, as though it were always necessary to fight for a single idea. A man with a trained imagination may conceive and discard fifty partial ideas in twenty minutes and then have something really good. Learn to see a plot in anything and you'll never be at a loss for plots, and learn, too, to see more than one idea in a happening.

Looking out of our window into the fifth story of a building across the street we see a desk at which a man is writing. A man in his shirt sleeves stands beside the desk talking to a third man who has his hat and coat on. Their conversation is spirited, but we cannot hear it at this distance. There are a lot of plots in so simple a thing. Let's dig out a few.

John Jones is a small merchant. James Smith is a large wholesaler. Jim Smith is his son and has been taken into the firm as a salesman that he may learn the business. Jim meets and falls in love with Jones' daughter, Nellie. He has told his father of his intention of marrying her. This does not accord with Smith's plans for his son, but he is too wise to argue. Jim has the Smith temperament. Jim wants Jones to enlarge his business. For that reason he sells him a bill of goods out of proportion to his present trade. Not only that, he gets his father to guarantee the bills that Jones contracts with dealers in other lines. Jim thinks it's mighty fine of his father. Then the crash comes. Jones cannot meet his bills. Smith takes them up. He wipes Jones out of business. Jones comes to plead for more time. Smith will not grant it. This is the scene that is being enacted across the street.

There are all sorts of possibilities to the finish. Perhaps Smith refuses any aid and closes Jones up. Jim goes with Jones and they start anew after the marriage of Jim and the girl. Perhaps Smith tells Jones he will pull him through on condition that the girl does not marry Jim, and she assents to the condition to save her father's credit. Perhaps on this account Jim quarrels with his father and leaves him. Perhaps the old man finally repents and lets Jim and the girl marry. Perhaps—any one of a score of different endings, all worked from the same start.

Perhaps the man in the coat is an inventor. Smith has stolen his invention and Jones comes to denounce him. Smith claims that as his workman, any invention of Jones belongs to the Smith business. It is the first glimpse Jim has had at the sordid side of his father's nature, his first realization of the manner in which the Smith fortune has been built up. In the quarrel Smith has a stroke of heart trouble and dies. Jones, fearing that he will be arrested, hides. Jim, now in possession of the Smith fortune, tries to make amends by engaging in practical welfare work. He meets a girl and falls in love with her. He proposes and is accepted. He goes to her father. It is Jones. Does Jim marry the daughter of the man who is indirectly responsible for the death of his father? If not, what course does he take.

Let's make it a light comedy. Young Jim has just started in business as a road instead of a city salesman. He sells a hundred dozen pairs of black silk stockings to an out-of-town concern. He is writing a letter to his sweetheart and transcribing the order. The sweetheart occupies his thoughts and he writes white instead of black. About the time he gets back from the road the order is delivered and the merchant is so sore that he comes to town to argue the matter with old Smith. The old man puts it up to Jim. He takes the matter to his sweetheart. She has some friends prominent in the social life of the town where the irate merchant's store is located. She and Jim go down there. The girl makes a sensation. Always she wears white stockings and tells the society reporters that all the real New Yorkers are wearing them. Jim visits the editors and gets them to run stories of the white stocking fad. The merchant is the only one in town with a full stock of white silk stockings. He sells out at a handsome profit and Jim makes good with his father and the girl's father and the girl and the merchant and everyone else.

Perhaps a farce would be better. Perhaps Jones is trying to crowd Smith out of business. Smith is equally anxious to see Jones go through bankruptcy. Jones has half a dozen clever women working for him, and since his line is women's garments, he has the best of the argument. Smith has an idea. He changes his office force and hires only bachelors. He requires these to marry Jones' clever women assistants. Young Jim is saved from the slaughter, but he promptly marries Jones' daughter. This pleases neither Smith nor Jones. Jones comes to Smith's office to make trouble. Jim throws a fresh bomb by announcing that he and Jones' daughter are going to start a new concern with all the other married couples and both Smith and Jones can get new staffs.

This article might be run on for several pages, but there should be enough here to show the value of the trained imagination in getting plots. See stories in everything, and please note it is written in the plural and not in the singular. Every situation has at least two sides, the comedy and the tragic, but there are all sorts of shades. Just this moment the two men in shirt sleeves and the man with the coat have come up on the roof. The visitor is either a master painter or the plumber, for the roof has long needed the attention of both, but that doesn't hurt the stories any. It merely serves to start a fresh chain of thought.

Prices.

William E. Wing writes William Lord Wright, in the Dramatic Mirror, to this effect: "Because unhappy precedent seems to have fixed the pitiful price of $25 upon a play for the screen, the majority of the manufacturers seem to be laboring under the conviction that this is a just and equitable arrangement that must last forever."

In a sense this is true, but only in a sense. An editor is not going to give an unknown writer $50 if he knows he will be glad to get $25 and on the other hand he will give more than $25 to the man he knows can keep on supplying good scripts. There is no reason why all stories should be worth $25 any more than a reason why all stories should be worth $50 or $100. The story is not worth a flat price, but what it is, of itself, worth. With men who regularly contribute to a certain studio it is found that the fixed price works well because the good, the bad and the in-between average up. If you get, say, $50 a reel and write one story worth not more than $25, you are $25 in. If you sell one for $25 that should be worth $75, you are $25 out, but if you sell both to the same studio you are making an even break. When you get to the point where you write more $75 stories than the $25 sort, ask for more money and you'll get it.

It is our own belief that the staff and contract writers working independently, can do more good toward raising prices than any concerted action on the part of a number of writers. The staff men get the studios used to paying more money and more will be paid the outsider because the general standard has been raised. A large number of the studios now pay a standard price of $50 for a story in reasonably good action and up to $100 for better work, and one manufacturer paid $200 a reel the other day who three or four years ago paid $5 for one of his big hits. The man who took the $5 argued the matter. His five-dollar story made a hit and he was up to from $60 to $75 when another studio put him on salary. He paved the way for all the others at a time when few writers were doing stories worth $60 and it was his example that brought others into the game.

As Mr. Wing points out, there are still many studios where $25 is regarded as the fixed standard through force of tradition, but these are gradually coming up and it is men like Wing who put the price up; not any combination of men.

Stories are getting better all of the time (some of them), and prices are getting better all of the time, simply because the stories are; but so long as now and then an amateur gets over an idea and gets paid $25 there will be a $25 price and the novice should be glad to get the $25 and try and make it $30 and $35 presently and so on up.

There are some stingy and short-sighted manufacturers, but there are more photoplay editors who are trying to show the boss how little their department costs, and that is where a lot of the trouble lies.

Comfort.

We know of a man who writes on a typewriter with two broken keys replaced with wads of chewing gum. The whole machine is in the same general state of repair. He thinks he is saving money by making the machine last.

If he had a new "mill" that would do good clean work with the least amount of effort, he would write more stories and better stories and get so much more for them, that presently he would have the machine paid for out of the profits. It would be an economy not to save the cost of a new machine, and a five-dollar bill would start the machine coming on the part-payment plan. It pays to work in comfort. Even so small a thing as a poor ribbon or a chair the wrong height may take ten dollars off the value of a story.

Inquiries

NOTE—No inquiries can be replied to by mail. Look for your answer here. No questions can be replied to that necessitates the handling of the manuscript. Always give your name and address. It will not be published. A list of addresses, to which photoplays should be sent, will be supplied on receipt of a STAMPED AND SELF ADDRESSED ENVELOPE. The request should be made to the paper direct and not to this department, nor to the Answers Man.

C. M. C.—All manuscripts submitted must be typewritten on a good quality of paper cut the regular typewriter size, 8½ by 11 inches. The synopsis should be held to 250 words. You should have a copy of Technique of the Photoplay if you need to query such simple matters.

S. A. V. P.—The moral effect rather than the facts are considered by the Censors in passing or rejecting a subject. It does make a heap of difference if crime is punished and a moral lesson taught. The letters would hardly be found objectionable as you state them. Most assuredly the act of forgery would be killed. The actual commission of crime, showing how, is regarded as objectionable.

M. A. T.—There are no companies making an especial bid for scripts from the novice, but all companies watch the submissions in the hope of turning up some "comer." Read the news columns of the paper to keep posted on advance wants. The rejection is a polite way of hiding the fact that your story is too much like a lot of others. Get a more novel idea.

I. W. L.—If you'll read the advertisements (and the advertisements are as interesting to the writer as the news pages) you'll find that nothing has "become" of the Helen Gardner company. Still doing business. There is no company making a specialty of Arabian pictures. Try Selig or Western Universal. "Auntie's Affinity" was written for Mrs. Walters and Peter Lang by Lawrence S. McCloskey, which is why he styled it "a Lang-Walters" comedy.

C. B. J.—Read the "Stories of the Films" to find out what companies are using children. Try Keystone (if comedy), Powers, Edison.

MRS. W. T.—A scene plot is not required. Unless you feel pretty certain that your script will be rigidly adhered to, it will not be of great value other than to give the editor a general idea of the scenes required.

C. D. M.—That's too wildly improbable a story to stand much chance of a sale. Better let it lie until you can get up a more convincing line of action. As a proposition, you need a climax at the end of the first reel. This should be at the end of half the action. If cutting down the scenes brings your first crisis in the middle of the first reel and gives you a tame ending to the first reel, don't change. Query the story by all means. Four months is over the limit. After a script has made the rounds, do not offer again until after thorough revision and strengthening.

C. A.—Miss Mildred Harris was Mildred in "Grand Dad." Don't get that second title. John E. Ince was Officer Jim in the Lubin of that title.

17 Madison Avenue - New York City

Projection Department

Conducted by F. H. RICHARDSON

Manufacturer's Notice.

IT is an established rule of the Moving Picture World and of this department that no apparatus or other goods will be endorsed or recommended editorially until such articles have been demonstrated to a member of our staff. In case of apparatus pertaining to projection this means the editor of this department.

Important Notice.

Owing to the mass of matter awaiting publication it is impossible to reply through the department in less than two to three weeks. In order to give prompt service, those sending 4 cents, stamps, (less than actual cost), will receive carbon copy of the department reply, by mail, without delay.

The first seventy-four questions are now ready and printed in neat booklet form. They may be obtained by remitting 25 cents, money or stamps, to the editor. Every live, progressive operator should get a copy. You may be surprised at the number of questions you can't answer without a lot of study.

Question No. 34.

Best answer will be published, and the names of others sending in replies of excellence will appear in the Roll of Honor. Permission to use the contributor's name must accompany each answer, otherwise only the name of the city will be used. Theater managers looking for high class men will do well to watch the Roll of Honor.

What is the electrical action of a rotary converter when changing a.c. to d. c.? What is the correct method for starting a converter of the size and type used for moving picture work? Illustrate its connections by sketch, with explanation. Should a voltmeter connected across the d.c. side of a converter fluctuate badly, and you were unable to remedy the fault, to what would you attribute it? What would be the probable cause of the trouble?

Roll of Honor on Question No. 28.

Question 28 proved a poser. It seems there were only about seven operators in all these United States and Canada who were capable of, or at least proved themselves capable of giving an intelligent answer to question 28. W. S. James, Camden, New Jersey; L. B. Minges, Lestershire, New York; Jos. H. M. Smith, Fort Worth, Texas; W. M. Lamb, Petersburg, Virginia; St. Paul, Minnesota; L. S. Usher, Winnipeg, Canada; Harry T. Dobson, Toronto, Canada, and S. S. Holt, Marshalltown, Iowa.

This is an unfortunate state of affairs since question 28 is exceedingly important and a highly practical one. Manufacturers of motor generator sets claim certain efficiencies, and the purchaser should oblige these manufacturers to back up those claims by a written guarantee. But how can this be done if the operator is not himself in position to check up the performance of the set?

Reply to Question No. 28.

By St. Paul, Minnesota.

The question:

What do you understand by the term "efficiency," as applied to a motor-generator set? What is considered high efficiency for such sets? Suppose you installed a d.c. to d.c. economizer on 110-volt current, the machine having 67 per cent. efficiency, how would its performance compare, in economy, with resistance? Suppose the set cost $250, how long would it require to save its price, using an average of 35 amperes eight hours per day? Suppose the current to be 220 volt, how long would it then require?

The answer:

The term efficiency as applied to the motor generator set means the relation of the wattage consumed by the motor to the wattage delivered by the generator. I would consider 70 or at the most 75 per cent. as high efficiency for a set of this kind, and I believe that the true efficiency will be found to be nearer 67. In order to make an absolutely correct test of the efficiency of a motor generator set it would be necessary to have two ammeters and two voltmeters, one of each connected on the motor feeders and one of each on the generator output wires. You then take the readings of both voltmeters and both ammeters simultaneously. Multiply the volts by the amperes on motor side and the volts by the amperes on the generator side, which will give you the input wattage and output wattage at the same instant of time. You now divide the output wattage (the smaller amount) by the input wattage (the larger amount) and the result will be a decimal fraction representing the efficiency of the device. Care should be taken, however, that the generator is delivering its normal output—the output you usually use—at the time the test is made, since the efficiency of a set may vary with different loads, and its true efficiency for your purpose is, or ought to be that shown when delivering the normal load. Also you must know that both ammeters and both voltmeters are correct. If the d.c. to d.c. economizer has an efficiency of 67 per cent. then a comparison of this performance to the performance of the rheostat would be made as follows: On d.c. your rheostat must break down the voltage to approximately 48, therefore with an arc voltage of 48 your rheostat only has an efficiency of about 44 per cent., whereas assuming the motor generator set to have an efficiency of 67 per cent., and there would be a gain in favor of the motor generator set of the difference between 44 and 67 per cent, or 23 per cent. of the wattage. If the arc were using 35 amperes at 110 volts the consumption would be 3,850 watts, and since the saving between the motor generator and the rheostat would be as between 44 and 67 per cent., or 23 per cent., and 23 per cent. of 3,850 is 885 watts, or, roughly, .9 kw., or 7.2 kw. per eight hours. Now if current was costing 8 cents per kw. this would mean approximately a saving of 57 cents a day, so that if the set cost $250 it would take a little more than five hundred days to pay for same, not counting the item of depreciation or anything of that kind. As a matter of fact on this basis the account as between the rheostat and economizer would show very little difference. If, however, the voltage be 220, then the performance would be entirely different, because the motor-generator waste would be not more, or very little more than it would be at 110 volts, whereas the rheostat must waste the entire difference between the arc voltage and 220, or 220 — 48 × by the amperage.

St. Paul has overlooked the power factor in case of an a.c. motor, as well as one or two other things, but this will be covered in answer to question 29.

A Clever Device.

By invitation of Frederick Tichy, New York City, the editor recently viewed a very clever device upon which letters Patent 1,087,699 have been granted. This device, known as the Szeliga Automatic Film Fire Preventer, performs the following functions in case of fire: (a) stops the machine motor; (b) puts out the arc; (c) puts on the auditorium lights; (d) cuts off the film at the fire valve at the upper and lower magazines, and hermetically seals the openings in fire valve; (e) closes all lenses and observation ports. All of this is done instantly upon the inception of a fire at the aperture of either machine or at the film box. The device goes even farther than this and perfoms these functions when the film breaks, but this has been found to render the apparatus too sensitive and complicated, and has therefore been discarded. In its present state I saw nothing about it which would require any very expert knowledge on the part of the operator, and the device certainly does the work it is intended to do. The observation and lens ports are covered by shutters made of steel, and just above an opening set into the wall are electro-magnets which are normally charged and hold the ports open as long as the current is on, but when the device cuts the current off from those magnets the shutters instantly drop by their own weight. Just under the upper magazine is a brass box about a foot long which contains several connections, and a knife which cuts off the film and seals the upper magazine. On the wall are four small switches which operate the device. The apparatus is not at all in the way, nor does it look bad—quite the contrary. As to the expense of installation, I could not say, since it would, I presume, be different in each case. It can be fitted to any make of projector. Those interested can secure full information by sending 10 cents to the Patent Office, Washington, D. C., and asking for a copy of patent No. 1,087,699 issued February 17, 1914.

Acetone Cement.

Leland Timmers, Seymour, Wisconsin, encloses $2.50 for a Handbook and says:

> I must improve, and am slowly beginning to perceive that I cannot be up to date without your Handbook. I read the articles in the department pertaining to acetone as a cement, but must say have had no success with it. I have found that by removing the emulsion from film and dissolving some of the film in acetone and adding a little hydrochloridic acid it makes a fairly good cement, but the value of the same varies with the age of the acetone—that is to say, its quality deteriorates with time. Success to the Moving Picture World, and to the editor of its projection department. The department is invaluable to any operator. Keep up the good work.

We shall endeavor to, my dear sir. We have been "hammering away" at that "good work" thing for several years, and have just got the face of our hammer nicely brightened up. The best reward we have is in the knowledge that we have helped to strengthen the foundation of the moving picture structure by enabling thousands of operators to place better projection on their screens.

Slide Coating.

Mr. Sam W. B. Cohen, manager of the Western Slide Coating Company, Spokane, Washington, forwards a package of his "Slidene," a preparation for coating glass slides. The preparation is in the form of a powder, which is made ready for use merely by adding water. A single box will do a great many slides. The coating is a thoroughly practical one, and one which it is very easy to use. It is perhaps the best coating we have seen, and has the commendation of this department.

Curved Screens.

Vasco Pini, Brooklyn, New York, submits the following:

We are about to erect a 600 seat house with the screen curved so as to have all points equidistant from the lens. The contract calls for a vertical curve, but the contractor objected to this, saying that curved screens are not any longer built, and are not satisfactory. Are flat screens more desirable? Or if curved ones are used do you think that both vertical and horizontal curves are necessary?

I would advise against the use of curved screen. You have possibly noticed during the time when concave screens were advertised that this department did not give its approval to that particular proposition. Theoretically the curved or concaved screen is correct, but from a practical standpoint it is not, for the very simple reason that the entire audience does not see the picture from one viewpoint, and if you concave the screen it simply adds to the angle at which that portion of the audience seated near the front and to the side views the picture, and therefore increases the distortion. The practical thing to do, and the thing which will work out in practice, is to get lenses which are corrected for flatness of field. Personally I am inclined to think that the benefit derived from this is not worth the cost, except where the lens is of short angle, say less than 4 inches e. f. But I do not believe that with objectives of less than 4 inch e. f. considerable advantage could be gained by this correction. In other words, I think that with lenses of less than four inches e. f. the correction is advisable, although such a lens is somewhat expensive. In this connection I have sent the following letter to both the Gundlach Manhattan and the Bausch & Lomb companies. I will advise you later as to their replies:

Gentlemen:—

There is frequently a very considerable distortion and lack of sharpness at the edges of the field where objectives of 4 inch e. f. lens are used. As I understand matters this could be overcome by correcting the lenses for flatness of field, and I would like to inquire of your company as to whether you can do this or not, and what the approximate cost of lenses thus corrected would be, as compared to your ordinary objective lenses. A reply at your earliest convenience will be appreciated, and I believe that if you can do this without excessive cost there will be a wide demand for that sort of thing in the very near future.

A New Union.

H. P. Hawley, Vincennes, Indiana, writes:

We are organized at last, and are going to try to put on better work. Ours is only a provisional charter, but we expect to have a direct before the year is out. Our number is I. A. T. S. E. 572. We have just installed Fairbanks-Morse motor generator sets in two of our theaters. They are rated at 60 volt, 58.3 amperes; 3.5 k. w. They are giving good results, except that the first couple of days we did not understand d. c. and kept letting the arc go out, blowing fuses, etc. But I got out my "Bible," the Handbook, did a little digging and now things are running pretty nice. Believe me I would be lost without that Handbook. Here are a few stunts some of the boys might try. I have a Power's Six and did not want to open the side door every time I had to shift my top carbon, so I cut a hole in the right hand side door one half inch from the top and one inch from the back, the same about two inches wide and three inches long. I then had a new shift rod made, seven inches long, and put it in place of the short one, and then punched a pin-hole in the front of the lamp house just above the condenser lens so I could see how the crater was burning and line up if necessary. If the brother who was asking about acetone will write me I will tell him what to mix with it to make good cement.

Friend Hawley also set forth his method of making a vent pipe damper, but it was a very complicated thing to describe, and would require too much space. I cannot advise the cutting of holes in the lamp house as he describes, since inspectors would not stand for it. I am glad to know that the Vincennes boys are organized. I trust the new union will prosper, and will be the means of bettering conditions of the Vincennes men materially. Don't make the mistake that many new unions do, and think that now you are organized that you can grab the earth by the north pole and throw it around like a foot ball, because you cannot. Proceed carefully and cautiously. Be sure there is right and justice behind your demands ,and do not try to get too much all at once. Approach the manager with an argument, and don't carry a club in one hand behind your back when you do it. Leave the club at home; you can always go back and get it if you have to. This advice is not only for the Vincennes boys but might be read with profit by all other newly organized unions. Governments have discovered that an ounce of diplomacy is often worth several tons of powder and lead, though the latter is still sometimes necessary—more shame to civilization.

It Helps Them.

Truman, Minnesota, writes:

This is my first offense, but if I am not put out it won't be the last one. Am located in a small town, but that does not hinder me from putting on a good picture. Believe I am putting on one of the best, if not the best around here, using a Powers Six A machine and a 60-volt belted generator, driven by an engine. One thing which bothers me, however, is the [illegible] I should use. I have a 60-foot throw, with a [illegible] screen. What would you consider as a suitable combination? As using a 13 inch carbon below a 5/8 above and get a great light, though not as brilliant as I would like it.

I would get two 7½ condensers and one 6½. I would lay the 6½ behind and 7½ in front, and then the two 9½ lenses, using the combination which gives the best results. In this connection I am asking Brother James to tell us what combination he would suggest, giving [illegible] reasons therefor. I would request you to try it out when published.

From West Virginia.

Grafton, West Virginia, writes as follows:

I note in February 28th issue, C. C. Beach has trouble with his lamp. There is no question but that a lens can be put to the bad as well as other parts of the projector, but with reasonably intelligent care they are, I think, the thing least likely to get out of order. Lenses, however, must be kept perfectly clean, though some operators do not seem to realize this fact. A dirty lens cannot be expected to deliver high class results on the screen. I have a set of lenses which acted precisely the same as those brother Beach described. I took them out and found they were blurred, or, in other words, "leafed". By looking very carefully these little specks look like a leaf from a maple tree. This damage came about while I was away. Upon my return I noticed the picture was badly out of focus, nor could the trouble be remedied. I looked into the lens while the machine was running and could see little specks which looked very much like oil. These specks which I call "leaves" are caused by the heat, or at least that is my idea. After questioning the substitute operator I found he had been trying to reset the machine, which he had gotten out of place in some way, the day before, and in order to get it right on the screen he put the light on for, as he told me, not over five minutes. Now, if one will stop and consider the matter, a great deal more heat reaches the objective lens with the film out than with it in, and in that length of time a cheap grade of lens will be very likely to take damage. Glass, as we all know, will expand with heat, and steel, or whatever other metal is used in making optical glass, does not get hot so quickly, and the unequal expansion thus caused makes a small crack or opening in the glass, which divides itself from the metal particles in these leaf shaped specks. Not long ago another operator in a near-by town showed me lenses damaged thus, and informed me that he used his machine lens to produce a floodlight for the acts. My solution of the trouble may not be correct, but I have set forth my idea at least. In this neck of the woods seven out of every ten of the operators are doing good work. When a city operator wants a new machine part it is but a question of moments to secure it. But out here it is often up to the operator to either make a part which will take the place of the broken one, or else close the house until one can be obtained from an exchange located perhaps a hundred miles away. Managers soon find out what the operator can do, and most of us carry a set of tools with which we can make almost anything from a tension shoe to a fly-wheel—something that will answer the purpose until a new part can be obtained. And now let me ask you a question. Am using 110 volt, 60 cycle a. c., pulling anywhere from 45 to 60 amperes. The current is very unsteady. Have a transformer in the operating room and the reading on the transformer is: "Series Converter, primary 200 amp. secondary 5 amp., 110 volt; Washinghouse make." The meter plate reads 110 volt a. c. current; 60 cycle 5 amperes. Why should the reading of my meter be multiplied by 40? The light company tried to explain it to me, but I could not understand. They said the meter did not register but 1/40 of the current consumption, and that was all they knew about it. I do not think they wanted me to know.

I have published that lens matter more because your solution is a curious thing than anything else. Your idea that the metallic parts of the glass would separate from the glass itself under heat would mean that the metal in the glass remains in the form of metal particles. This is not true. I do not know much about the manufacture of glass, but, as I understand it, the metal becomes a component part of the glass and ceases to be metal, as such, though under certain conditions it is still susceptible to corrosion. I think I will ask brother Wall to tell what the difficulty with Grafton's lens is if he, himself, is informed on that particular point. As to the meter; in order to secure a uniformity in size of meters certain meters are made straight reading while the reading of others must be multiplied by a certain given factor, as you will find explained on page 407 of the Handbook. The meter face, however, should bear the words "Multiplied by 40" if your meter is of the indirect reading type and 40 is the factor. I do not know that all indirect meters are thus marked, but they should be, since otherwise the consumer would be helpless, and the meter reader could use any constant he might wish to. If your meter does not bear somewhere on it the multiplying constant I would certainly try to make them install one which does. Your transformer must be a step-up transformer connected backwards.

Salaries.

I. B. E. W., Local No 636, Marion, Illinois, writes:

Will you please answer the following through the department as soon as possible. This city being too small for an operators' union, we have taken an operator into our organization. We would like to know what you would consider a fair salary for an operator in a town of 8,000, working six days a week, with one matinee, and what he should do. There are three houses here and this man is the only union man employed in any of them. He is getting $16.00 per week. Besides operating he does the [illegible] waiting for the daily press, and sees that things are running all right around the theater as the manager is out of town most of the time during the day. We want him to have a fair salary, and hence ask for your opinion.

You have put up a very hard proposition, brothers. In the first place, while I am not going to comment adversely on your taking the man into the I. B. E. W., under the circumstances stated, as conditions are at present he belongs in the I. A. T. S. E. What a fair salary would be would depend on a good many things. Viewed purely as an operating proposition, I should say in a town of that size the man ought to have $25.00, but, on the other hand, that would be equal to many of the city scales for similar work. But certainly if the man is expected to look after the house in addition to the operating he ought to have $30.00. As a matter of fact, he should have considerably more than that, but I am compelled to give you advice which will be practical. There is no use in telling you that the men ought "to get $25.00." If he is a good operator he should get it, but he cannot get it, so there you are, and $25.00 in that town by comparison with city scales will, I think, be a fair recompense for the work the man is doing.

Professor Wall Lands on Brother James..

E. J. Wall, Professor of Photography, Syracuse University, Syracuse, New York, contributes the following interesting article, which, no doubt, will cause brother James to surround himself with a cloud of smoke emanating from his rapidly moving typewriter. In this particular matter I have no friends. I cannot have. I am just simply going to let you scrap it out among yourselves. Of course, that is just my way of saying that I am not sure which one is right, but I do not want any of you to get wise to the fact that I do not know all about it. Personally I am inclined to rather lean both ways in this matter just now. What I mean by this is that I incline in brother James' direction because he is a practical moving picture operator, and has made actual experiments which have furnished a portion of his data. On the other hand, Professor Wall is well up on the technical end of matters, and I hope that between brothers Wall and James and friend Griffith, of Ansonia Connecticut, and others who are studying the lens question deeply, we shall finally arrive at a correct solution of the whole matter. No doubt brother James has made some errors, but, on the whole, I am prepared to say that his experiments have at least been very enlightening, and I think that any errors he has made in the technical end of it will be corrected in the argument which I can now see looming up ahead of us. Prof. Wall's criticism follows:

> W. S. James has obviously been to an immense amount of trouble, and it is a pity that he has evolved such a number of mistakes. For instance, when writing of the amount of refraction he entirely ignores the one most important point, namely the refractive index of the glass. Again all lenses have a focus—even negative lenses; but only positive lenses give a real image, while negative lenses give a virtual, or aerial image. Mr. James confuses "image" and "focus". No surface of a lens has a focus, but all lenses have an infinite number of conjugate foci, which are interdependent on the position of the object from the lens. Conjugate foci are merely two points at which image and object are interchangeable.
> It may be useful to others, as well as to Mr. James, to know that any object at a distance of not less than 1,500 times the focus of the lens will practically give parallel rays; the error with a 12-inch focus lens being only 1/100th of an inch.
> While he states the rule for finding the e. f. correctly, in all cases, he works it out wrongly, so that it doubtful whether or not he really understands the principle involved. It is a pity that he introduces a new term, "fi," instead of adopting that generally used in optics; but taking his data, his sum (top of 1st col. p. 358) is:
> $$\frac{1}{f} = \frac{1}{fi} + \frac{1}{n}$$
> $$= .25 + \frac{1}{fi} = .333$$
> $$\text{therefore } \frac{1}{fi} = .333 - .25 = .083$$
> therefore fi = 1 ÷ .083 = 12.04 etc.

This is near enough to his result, but it shows the working, which his method does not. When he states that the rear lens of Fig. 6 has no focus, he is in error, and if he will try it out he will find he can obtain an actual image, but as the lens suffers from great spherical aberration, the image will not be sharp. This is why he cannot project with it. His explanation of the achromatising of a crown by a flint lens is hopelessly wrong, and I can show him a dozen flint glasses which have less dispersion than crown, and at the same time prove that the flints have greater dispersion than the crown. It is entirely a matter of what part of the spectrum, or in other words what color, you take.

As regards the light lines A F, in Fig. 6, which he says represent the "objective ray," and which he has not been able to photograph, it may save him further trouble if I tell him that the "objective ray" does not exist. Therefore the whole of his arguments based on this, fall to the ground. And further, his optical center does not exist; a doublet has no optical center. That is a property of simple lenses only.

We now come to page 359 and his numerical equations. In the first place if one must take note of the separation of the lenses, which is only 1/4th of an inch, why cut 1/4 inch off the focus? But taking his figures we obtain: (6 × 26) ÷ (6 + 26 — 3/8) = 156 ÷ 31⅝ = 4.932 inches. This is the e. f. of the condenser and not 4.5 inches.

Again, taking his second example: 7.5 × 0.5 ÷ (7.5 + 9.5 — 1/4) = 71.25 ÷ 16.75 = 4.25 and not 4½ inches as he states. With regard to the next equation, I must confess that I do not understand it. Merely taking his third and fourth lines, 17+ fi = 117; fi = 7. If this is so then 2 plus 2 do not make 4, because if we write 2 + fi = 4, then fi = 4 — 2 is hopelessly wrong. Surely if 17 plus n = 117, n = 117 minus 17, because the only number that you can add to 17 to make 117 is 100. Rewriting his equation we obtain 1 f + 1 26 = 1/4.5 = 1/f ÷ .0384 = .2222. Therefore 1/f = .2222 — .0384 = 0.1838, therefore f = 1 ÷ 0.1838 = 5.44. With regard to his photographs, he is certainly to be congratulated on these, only they are of little value because they are not to the same scale, and while I have not actually duplicated them, I must at once warn your readers against accepting the last five figures as true representations of what actually takes place, without further confirmation, because I have very grave suspicion that he is merely showing flare and ghosts formed in his lens, and not condenser actions at all—certainly in No. 7 he is merely showing a ghost. To those who do not know, flare and ghosts are two of the most tricky things in the whole of optics, and personally I cannot see how to avoid them when using the lens that Mr. James did, and they are absolutely misleading; because unless one actually has tested the lens in use they lead to the most extraordinary conclusions. For instance: in the Gundlach lens, which I assume to be of the type shown in Fig. 6, there are six glass air surfaces and there can be at least 36 ghosts and flares to obscure the result. I do not wish to say that Mr. James is wrong, but until his results are corroborated they must be taken with caution. Neither do I wish to discourage him, but I warn him that the subject of the optics of projection has never been properly dealt with in any book on optics, and one must know a good deal to apply the ordinary text book rules. Had he adhered to the diagrams and formulas I sent him privately, and if he had only put into my formula measurements of his machine instead of the lettering he would never have made half the mistakes he has.

Westinghouse Reflector.

Ohio orders a copy of Swoope's book, and says:

> Can you give me any information concerning the Westinghouse rectifier? We are using a 30 ampere capacity Westinghouse and I find no way of increasing the amperage, though the manager says it can be done. It only has four connections which are used for primary voltage, 105 to 115. We are using 5 inch e. f. lens; throw 87 feet, with a 17 foot picture. Increased the picture from 14.9 to 17 feet and, of course, this decreases the illumination. Use a calcimo coated screen, plain white. Manager says picture should be brighter. It was very good before we moved the screen. What's the answer? I said on acccunt of moving the screen back 9 feet we could not get as bright a picture as before, using the same lens. Manager said it did not make any difference. Do you know whether or not the Westinghouse set can be changed to increase or decrease the amperage? It is rated at 30 amperes. Can we get any more out of it?

No, I cannot give you any information regarding the Westinghouse, because the Westinghouse people have up to date not seen fit to supply this department with any data whatever concerning their rectifier. If the tube is of 30 ampere capacity it would probably shorten its life very greatly to overload it, though it is barely possible the transformer end of the rectifier might stand a 10 ampere overload without damage, in which case you could use a 40 ampere tube, provided there is any way of increasing the current flow to that extent. The moving of your screen back would not make any difference merely by reason of the longer throw, but the moving of it back, and using the same lens has the effect of increasing the size of the picture, and this cuts your illumination very rapidly. If you had, say, a 15-foot picture before, it was then 11¼ x 15 feet equals practically 170 square feet. A 17-foot picture is 12¾ x 17 equals practically 208 square feet. So that the illumination of your screen would be decreased in the same ratio that 208 bears to 169. Putting it another way you have increased your screen area by about 59 feet, but you have not increased your total light at all. You are simply spreading the same amount of light you were using on 169 square feet around over 208 square feet. I think both you and your manager ought to see that point clearly.

Carbon Size.

Henry H. Link, Mobile, Alabama, says:

> Here are a few questions I would like your views on. First, what size carbons are best when using 60 to 75 amperes of current? Second, what focal length condenser is best when projecting a 17-foot picture at 66 feet?

My dear sir, you have left out a very important matter, viz.: the kind of current. I presume you mean a.c. In which case I would use ¾ cored carbon above and either a ¾ or ⅝ cored below, whichever I could get the best results with. If you are using 60 to 75 amperes d.c., I would use a ⅞ cored above and a ¾, either solid or cored, below; my own personal preference being solid. But I would not advise the use of that amperage d.c. with a condensing lens only 4½ inches in diameter; you get more light, but it is at enormous expense. As to the condenser: you are using about a 3¾ objective. I am not quite far enough along to give you any certain advice on the condenser-objective combination, but I believe 6½-7½ combination will be O. K. I think you ought to be able to dope that matter out from a study of brother James' article, April 18th issue. For a long time I advised the use of two 6½ lenses in anything under a 3½ objective and two 7½ for anything over a 4½ objective, but just now I have pulled in my horns, and am not giving any advice on that particular subject.

California Architect Shows Good Sense.

Wayman E. Doyle, Fresno, California, writes:

> My intention to write has finally been focused by the misstatement in the Chicago Section recently. A Mr. Lawrence, ex-manager of one of the houses here, among other misstatements, says that most of the theaters in this city are owned by Turner & Dahnken. The fact of the matter is only one theater is owned by those gentlemen, and that is a nickel house. One of the theaters mentioned, the Kinema Theater, is a part of the Kehrlein Kinema Circuit. It is a 1400 seat house, built specially for pictures and without a stage. Its ventilation plant would interest you. The prices are to, 15 and 25 cents at all times, and they get it, too. When it came to the operating room the architect left it to myself, and with the Handbook, the department and the help of brother Woods, we planned and built an ideal operating room from the floor up. If there is anything you recommend which is not included it must be because we did not see it. I have been working for these people for the past three years, and am helping on the plans of the operating room for their new 3000 seat house in Oakland. Our hot summers make necessary an elaborate ventilating system. Under every other seat there is a mushroom, and the ceiling under the balcony is literally honeycombed (artistically) with ventilators, all of which are supplied by air from a large 8-foot multivane American Blower fan, located in the basement. And in winter this air is passed over heated coils while in the summer the coils are cooled by our own ice plant, and we expect to reduce the temperature by at least 20 degrees. The ceiling forms a vacuum chamber, insulating the heat on the roof from the house, with 750 square feet of ventilators to draw off the 36,000 cubic feet of air per minute which the fan delivers. Have just passed through three days of nerve racking work with an old copy of "From the Manger to the Cross". Every church in town gave up Holy Week to the Kinema for we had a pastor and a choir for each performance. And did we pack the house? Well the police wanted to arrest the manager for blocking traffic, and I had to run two extra performances after the regular shows. I looked for those horrible scenes that Mr. G. Hollister referred to in his letter to you, March 28th issue, but if they were there they were so much better than some of the photography that we are burdened with from other manufacturers that I did not notice them. The condition of the film was, of course, rotten; patches and scratches everywhere. I wish Hollister would teach one certain company, whose films are invariably dark and out of focus, though there are lots of other manufacturers who might improve also, particularly in these days when perfect photography is a possibility. The manager and myself have been stewing over the efficiency of mercury arcs. We find there is a discrepancy as to the percentage of loss claimed by the manufacturers and the actual performance. Will submit data of intake and output as soon as complete. We have a 50 ampere Westinghouse rectifier which we find to be very substantial and heavily built and very little likely to get out of order.

This is a most interesting letter. We trust the Chicago office will consider itself duly slapped on the ankle, and behave itself in the future. As regards that Oakland house, brother Doyle, I will be glad to send you an improvement on the automatic shutter idea, as set forth in the Handbook. That architect certainly showed good sense, which I am sorry to say the average architect does not. Most architects who are called upon to plan moving picture theaters either know very little, or nothing at all about projection, yet instead of calling in or consulting a practical operator, or a projection engineer they butt ahead and—make a mess of it. My compliments to the architect in question. Please send me his name and address. That ventilating system sounds good, but where there is plenty of water available I am inclined to believe it is a good plan to pass the air through a water spray. It removes all dust particles and if cold water can be had it also lowers the temperature, though it is true it also raises the humidity. The water spray does not, of course, prevent the coils from being used also. As to the films you mention I, myself, know there is room for improvement, and yet I have seen some of their comedy films which were very good indeed, and certainly not at all out of focus. I would not care to comment on the rectifier matter. There should only be a comparatively slight loss in a rectifier. I shall be glad to have those figures when they are ready.

Likes the Brush Light Plant.

Crockett Brown, manager Unique Theater, Nashwauk, Minnesota, writes:

Enclosed find 25 cents for the questions. It is nearly a year since I last wrote you, and I had then just returned from Detroit where I purchased a Brush Light Plant from the Strelinger Company. I agreed to make a report on this plant as soon as I had given it a thorough trial, and seeing a letter headed "Excessive Light Bill," page 210, April 4th issue, I am prompted to do this, as I ran my theater under exactly the same conditions for four years, and my light bill was often as much as $45.00 a month for the machine alone, running two hours each evening, seven days a week. I knew something must be done, but what? Naturally I wrote the projection department, and then I wrote to all the manufacturers of isolated plants, and needless to say I got a dray load of catalogues and circulars and read them until I was dizzy. I had the worst case of missouritis you ever heard of. Finally made up my mind that a thing as important as current for projection was not one to be trifled with. I therefore visited Minneapolis, Chicago, and Detroit and finally purchased a Brush outfit. The expense of investigation was as nothing as compared with the money I had wasted, paying 10 cents per kw. for 220 volt d.c. through a rheostat. And now, in return for the hundreds of helpful hints I have received through the department, I feel it my duty to supply your readers with my experience since installing the plant. The plant I bought and am using seven days each week is illustrated on page 110 of the World, April 4th issue. It is the smallest made, but is large enough for my work. The generator is a 2 kw., 65 volt, 30 ampere, and the plant complete weighs 650 pounds. It only takes up a floor space of 21 by 31 inches. Mine is located within 15 feet of the screen at the rear of the theater, and it cannot be heard running inside the auditorium. I have connection with the city current, so that I can switch over in less time than it requires to change a reel. Four times since I installed this plant the village "juice bucket" went bumps, leaving the entire town in darkness except the Unique Theater, which continued business without interruption. I use 22 amperes at the arc and get much better results with 40 amperes a.c. As to the cost, I find, by actual test, not guess work, that it requires only one gallon of gasoline, at 14 cents per gallon, and 3 cents worth of engine oil to run from 7:30 to 9:30—two hours. Up to date I have not spent one single penny for repairs, and there is no doubt about the excellence of the work done. The plant cost me a trifle over $400, including the special wiring, etc., but it more than returned the original investment in just one year's time. Within ten years I expect to see 50 per cent. of the theaters operating their own plants. The thing which puzzles me is that anyone would be satisfied with a.c. for projection when d.c. can be had so easily and so cheaply. In conclusion, I would present to the gentlemen from Oklahoma, or anyone else, the following list of don'ts: (a) Don't buy a plant too small for your requirements. (b) Don't buy a belted plant. The direct connected costs you a hundred dollars or so more, but it is worth six times as much. (c) Don't accept anything but a compound wound 65 or 70 volt generator. (d) Don't buy a plant thinking your lady cashier, or a ten-year-old kid, can run it, as some manufacturers claim. Plants of this kind require intelligent attention, the same as any machine does. Keep the generator and the engine well cleaned and oiled, and then let well enough alone. Don't tear it apart just to see what makes the wheels go round. I would like to say lots more, but will come again if this gets by. I am a small town exhibitor, and have my own printing press for handbills, cards, etc. Can print anything up to 6 x 10 inches, which means anything I need in a town of this size. Bought the press on my last visit to Chicago a year ago. It represents an investment of $25, and has paid for itself many times over, as I can hand-bill the whole town at a cost of 15 cents, not counting my time, which amounts to about two hours setting type.

You hit the nail square on the head, brother Brown, when you said the lady cashier or a ten-year-old kid cannot run these light plants. They are simple and easy to handle if you use ordinary sense, and know a little something about electrical action and machinery. There are three types of owners and operators of isolated plants. The first being the Crockett-Brown type, who keep the machine clean and well oiled, and let it alone as long as it is working all right; the second type is the man who wants to be eternally tinkering; he has to take out the chronometer balance and cylinder escapement of the thing to find out where the exhaust comes from. He pulls the device to pieces just to be pulling, and when he comes to put it together again usually has a few parts which do not seem to belong anywhere. The third type is the opposite of the second; he is either afraid of putting the thing out of order, or is too lazy to do what should be done. He sets it down in a dry goods box out in the rear of the theater, buys his eight-year-old son a hammer and cold chisel and says, there is something for you to play with, kid and the kid plays with it, too, with result that can be better imagined than described.

Nightmare Pictures.

Roy R. Stewart, Tucson, Arizona, contributes three post cards and the following:

Regarding the item, April 11th issue, about the operator who fainted, I enclose a few post cards illustrating the horrors of war. It is a cinch the National Board of Censorship never got a glimpse of the moving pictures taken by Robert A. Turnbull, of which the name is "Carranza's Army, or Huerta's Nightmare." If you do not care to retain these postal cards you may return them to me with enclosed postage, but you are perfectly welcome to them if you want them. I think if the Adrian, Michigan, operator were to work here in Tucson he would be flopping over in one of those fainting attacks every once in a while.

You have one swell chance of getting those post cards back, brother Stewart. I don't think. Nothing doing! If I ever get it in for that Adrian boy, I will just send him one of those cards, and he will keel over in a faint so deep he will never wake up again. One card shows 473 bodies in one pile, and the bodies are there, all right, too, and they are in decidedly bad condition. Another card illustrates the playfulness of the Mexicans. The Federals had captured a rebel spy near Otda, and had hung him; but they made a mistake and attached a rope to his feet. Oh, they are nice cards all right! And if the moving pictures are anything like them I will remain carefully away when they are exhibited. The still pictures are quite sufficient, thanks!

Valuable Process.

Leopold Rosenbaum, Brooklyn, New York, presented to the department samples of films which have been treated by a process of which he is the inventor. This process is such that, while it is cheap and rapid, it thoroughly renovates the film, removing all rain marks, and, to an appreciable degree, seems to fireproof it; meaning by this that after the renovating process is completed the film is treated with a coating which, while it does not render it non-inflammable, still it does reduce its liability to catch fire to a very large degree. It is a well known fact that you can push a lighted cigar or cigarette through a piece of film without, as a rule, setting it ablaze; but with film treated by brother Rosenbaum's process you can not only do this, but you can hold the cigar or cigarette against the film, moving it around, and burn the film completely up, without setting it ablaze.

From what I have seen of this process I believe it would to all intents and purposes eliminate all danger of the film catching fire at the aperture. I do not believe it would be possible to set it ablaze at the aperture of the machine by means of the light rays, though I think it quite likely that if the film be bunched up in a pile the light ray might set it ablaze. But be this latter as it may, the process seems, as I have said, to have distinct value, and it is entitled to serious consideration on the part of film producers and others interested.

IN REAL LIFE Essanay, May 12.—To prove that there are happenings in real life as exciting as the wildest melodrama on the stage, incidents supposed to have actually happened are pictured. When they fail to ring true and lack in conviction, the entire picture loses its punch. There are dashes of good comedy in the picture.

THE WALLFLOWER (Lubin), May 12.—Humor and satire of the subtle kind make this subject particularly interesting. The helplessness of the modern society girl when it comes to the practical things of life is exaggerated, perhaps, but with justification in that the main idea will appeal to the average observer as founded in fact. Pathos and laughter are well combined.

AN ALASKAN INTERLUDE (Edison), May 12.—Below par as an Edison dramatic release. Although taken in the snow around New York, there is slight suggestion of the Alaskan wilds in the settings. The story throughout suggests "much ado about nothing."

DOC YAK, THE MARKSMAN (Selig), May 12.—Another series of funny antics by Sydney Smith's popular cartoon character used as a "tag" on the reel with "Marian, the Holy Terror."

MARIAN, THE HOLY TERROR (Selig), May 12.—An exceptionally good comedy with its scenes laid in the West. The many laughs are legitimately won. Author and producer have shown great skill in first setting a goal and then steadfastly pushing ahead until that goal is reached.

A PAIR OF STOCKINGS (Selig), May 13.—A great deal of the story is trite; but the stocking episode, with its decided lingerie appeal, is new and will amuse the many, although its lack of reasonableness detracts from its farce value. Pretty girls in the picture make love gracefully and it has its pretty scenes; but the acting is noticeably conventional. The photography is clear and commendable.

THREE LITTLE POWDERS (Essanay), May 13.—A pleasing offering in which a fine little farce gives place to a dream. This is trite enough at first, but works up to a very laughable and fresh climax. The acting, except the clown work in the fortune teller's den, is excellent. Wallace Beery and Beverly Bayne and many of the minor characters deserve praise. The photography is all that could be desired.

ANDY PLAYS CUPID (Edison), May 13.—Andy's a dandy for fresh fun in a picture; because he is unconscious of himself in his role which is still himself, and appeals to the play instinct which is so important a part of us all. This is the basis of his popularity and it also gives him a fine foundation on which to build a true actor when experience has taught him what life is so that he can interpret it. The offering is sure to be liked as well if not better than others of this series which Mark Swan is writing and Charles France is putting on.

BUDDY'S FIRST CALL (Vitagraph), May 13.—A farce, bright for the most part; it shows Buddy, a youngster, making his first call and how he is discomforted. Its only fault is that it is inclined to work its comedy incidents to the ground; yet it might have been acted with a bit more reality. As a whole, it is attractive and made not a little hearty laughter. F. Marion Brandon is the author and Tefft Johnson produced it.

HER MOTHER'S WEAKNESS (Biograph), May 14.—This is the story of a woman kleptomaniac, who leaves her daughter after disgracing her. Later, after serving a prison sentence, she reforms and tries to aid others who are tempted. The reconciliation scene in the court room was effectively handled. Kate Bruce as the mother gives one of the quiet, forceful performances that have made her conspicuous among screen favorites, in parts of this type. This is quite a strong number.

SLIPPERY SLIM'S STRATEGEM (Essanay), May 14.—This is a pleasing ranch comedy, in which Victor Potel plays the part of the "nosy" postmaster who mixes up Sophie's affairs. One admirer brings her a calf, another a ring and the third a corset. This works up to a laughable situation and is well photographed. The ranch characters are in good hands.

BATTY BILL ALMOST MARRIED (Melies), May 14.—Bill becomes enamored of a girl and sends a messenger to her on a motorcycle. The messenger knocks down people and furniture on the way in the usual eccentric manner. Many of the scenes are laughable and this makes an amusing half reel.

SAMMY'S DILEMMA (Melies), May 14.—This, on same reel with above, illustrates the efforts of a man to get rid of the body of his wife, whom he thinks he has killed. It possesses amusing moments.

THE SEA GULL (Vitagraph), May 14.—This is a pretty story of Indian life marred only by photography that is rather dim and unsatisfactory all the way through. It concerns the love of an Indian couple, which is temporarily ruffled by the appearance of another native girl. The near-tragedy on the cliff was well handled. The words of a poem in Hiawathian measure are used instead of subtitles.

AT LAST WE ARE ALONE (Selig), May 15.—A comedy number dealing with the efforts of a young couple to be alone together. The hero is a young author. He masquerades as a paper hanger and later both he and the girl feign sickness and go to the same hospital. The scenes in the hospital furnish the chief amusement of the picture, which is fairly strong.

A DARKTOWN WOOING (Kalem), May 15.—This half reel pictures a darky wedding, the groom being detained for a considerable period by financial matters. This is only fairly amusing, though the characterizations are good.

THE GIRL AND THE GONDOLIER (Kalem), May 15.—A burlesque in costume, on same reel with above. Signor Spaghetti bores a hole in the bottom of his rival's gondola and then saves the girl from drowning. The costumes and setting are elaborate and the production quite pleasing.

HIS SOB STORY (Edison), May 15.—This is a good film story of newspaper life. The young would-be reporter encounters a starving woman in the park, writes up a pathetic yarn about it and hands it to the managing editor. The woman happens to be the editor's wife. There is nothing extraordinary in the development of this story, but is is well constructed and has the qualities which give it appeal. Ben Wilson, Mathilda Baring and Charles Ogle are among those in the cast.

THE SIGNAL (Lubin), May 15.—Three characters have the chief parts in this drama, which is not overly strong. The hero tells the girl to start a bonfire if she needs help and when the Mexican pursues her she follows this advice. This is only of about average interest.

BUNNY BUYS A HAREM (Vitagraph), May 15.—Another successful production featuring Bunny and Flora, this time assisted by Rita Bori. The central idea is a humorous conceit in which Bunny falls to sleep and dreams he is buying a harem with stage money. He awakens to the usual painful realities. This is new and pleasing.

WHILE THE BAND PLAYED (Biograph), May 16.—While it played Prof. Hicks pulled teeth—he runs a perambulating dentist chair on the band wagon. Dad has a bad toothache and while the professor is extracting this the daughter and her comedy lover are getting spliced by the domini. It is a typical Biograph burlesque that the audience seemed to enjoy.

ALMOST AN OUTRAGE (Biograph), May 16.—On the same reel with the foregoing is this other farce in which Fido didn't get into the soup, but his collar did. Aunt Jane has a big appetite, but she is hard to console when she finds the collar until the dog which had been asleep on the coal down cellar appears. It has fresh things and amused the audience.

THE COWARD AND THE MAN (Edison), May 16.—Melodrama, made commercially and to suit the demand of the time, it is an acceptable offering though weak in art except in the acting. The players give a good many interesting touches to their parts. This makes it almost succeed in its intention, which was a melodramatic contrast of characters. Ashley Miller, both writer and producer, could have built a more convincing plot if he had taken time to. Charles Ogle, Miriam Nesbitt, John Sturgeon and the others do much to make it a popular offering.

THE WAR BONNET (Kalem), May 16.—The opening scene of this worthy offering shows clear photography and real Indians. Then a story of Redman life is told to tourists who are sight-seeing, the narrator being an old chief seated near his wigwam. It holds the attention well in spite of a touch of obscurity in its early scenes; for it is poetic and, though most improbable, is convincing. A pretty good offering.

THE TAINT OF MADNESS (Selig), May 16.—Audience received it in silence. That two or three got up and went out means nothing; but these morbid themes are surely not the most popular in offerings that are meant to be solely entertainment. The picture tells a story that is far from convincing and is, in its ending, almost self contradictory, and besides that isn't pleasant. It has a rescue of the heroine from a burning building by the hero; but even that is artificial, though well photographed. Not all of the scenes are up to the standard photographically. Malcolm Douglas is author and N. MacGregor is producer. Miss Allen and Harry Lonsdale have the leads, with William Scott as a convincing mad brother who really was adopted so the girl had no true taint in her blood.

BRONCHO BILLY'S LEAP (Essanay), May 16.—A good, thrilling picture that will surely take well with audiences. It is true that B. B. has reformed again; but the speedy riding and dashing rescue of the girl will make audiences forget all else while Broncho, who wants the express money box, but sees that the stage is running away with the driver's daughter (Marguerite Clayton), dashes at full speed after and leaps from galloping horse to jolting stage and pulls in the four-in-hand. It is very well put on and certainly gets over.

HE SAID HE COULD ACT (Lubin), May 16.—This will probably be the most popular picture among to-day's offerings. It has a good, well worked out and fresh plot by Epps Winthrop Sargent, and it has been handled in a dandy way by Director Arthur Hotaling. It made plenty of hearty laughter. Much credit is also due the three, real coon players, John Edwards, Mattie Edwards and Luke Scott, and also to the two white stage hands, Ray McKee and Billy Bowers. A very desirable offering.

DOROTHY DANESBRIDGE, MILITANT (Vitagraph), May 18.—Suffragist farces are no longer novelties and we find very little that is new in this—most of it is astonishingly trite; but it has broad humor which rises to something better when, after a suffrage meeting, Dorothy, in boy's clothes, is arrested and her lover, who had pitched in to save the suffragists from being mobbed, likewise and both are put in the same cell. It makes a fair offering, commercial, but skillfully done. Dorothy Kelly and James Morrison have the leads. W. A. Tremayne is author and Theodore Marston the director.

THE ADVENTURE OF THE COUNTERFEIT MONEY (Edison), May

18.—This is the fifth of the marvelous adventures of Octavius, amateur detective, and is, perhaps, the cleverest of this series that we have yet seen. The gawky detective "makes good" again after his own eccentric fashion and the manner of it makes hearty fun. Acting is one of the pictures strong points. Beside Octavius (Barry O'Moore), the character of Anne Raferty (Jessie Stevens) adds to it, as does the butler (Julian Reed), the store detective (H. S. Mack) and one or two others. Frederick Armold Kummer is the author and Charles M. Seay produced it. It is a good offering.

THE FATHER'S SCAPEGOAT (Biograph), May 18.—A good situation worked up without, it seems, much care or pains to make it persuade us that the event actually happened or even was likely to happen. It is a fair, not a strong, offering. The acting is often weak and never rises to be truly impressive.

HEARST-SELIG NEWS PICTORIAL (Selig), May 18.—Good, clear photographs of the arrival of the funeral ships bearing the caskets of the seventeen sailors and marines who died at Vera Cruz and of the ceremonies and the parade, fill most of the space in this offering and make it noteworthy.

Licensed Specials

THE TOREADOR'S ROMANCE (Gaiety), May 12.—A powerful dramatic plot constructed around the "Human Triangle" handled in such a way that no bad taste is left in the mouth. Scenes in a big bull ring while a bull fight is in progress deal intimately with the story and will prove very interesting. In two reels.

THE ACID TEST (Vitagraph), May 12.—Maurice Costello and Mary Charleson acquit themselves with great credit in this two-reel dramatic presentation. A society belle who has been secretly accused of marrying for money stands the "acid test" and discloses a heart of gold. The plot is admirably sustained throughout and, right up to the last minute, the audience is kept in doubt of the outcome.

IN THE NORTHLAND (Lubin), May 13.—There were people in the audience who seemed to be laughing at some of the scenes in this picture—its backgrounds are very amateurish. It is a story of the Northwoods country, which is wintry all the time but never truly wild-looking. The story is good and of true two-part calibre; but there is much in the first reel, especially while the situation is getting stated, that is unpleasant and not convincing—for instance, the way those scenes that immediately precede the elopement are handled lack vigor. The second reel is both interesting and big and makes the offering worth while. It has some good details, many graceful scenes and has clear photography. Emmett Campbell Hall is author and John Ince produced it.

A MAN'S SOUL (Kalem), May 13.—A two-part offering rather trite in its story and not vigorously acted. It is strictly old stuff done over; but has one or two stirring moments as, for instance, at its well-handled climax where the husband, who had been a drunkard, plays the man rescuing his wife and adopted son from danger in a mountain brush fire. The photography counts in its favor. There are scenes in it that add nothing significant and it might have been told in one reel.

MADAM COQUETTE (Lubin), May 14.—A two-reel number depicting some stormy scenes in the lives of a young married couple. The husband is neglectful and the wife seeks to arouse his jealousy by flirting with another. The action in the second reel is dramatic and almost tragic, but the happy ending is finally achieved. This photoplay is old in subject matter and contains no very new situations, but it is well constructed and well acted. Rosemary Theby, James Roberts and Joseph Kaufman have the leading parts.

THE STRENGTH OF THE WEAK (Pathe), May 14.—This two-reel number does not offer a remarkably strong story, yet it is so naturally and skillfully developed that it holds the interest and is quite appealing. It concerns a young man who stole some jewels in a moment of weakness; he afterwards comes to America and becomes a famous surgeon, saving his own sister's life. There is some confusion of characters at the beginning, but this clears up later. It seemed a little improbable that the sister should recognize her brother on the sickbed, while the mother failed to do so. The photography and settings are good.

ASHES OF HOPE (Essanay), May 15.—A two-reel number in which the photography is dim in places. Ruth Stonehouse plays the part of a famous dancer, who is compromised by an attorney, played by E. H. Calvert. Francis X. Bushman plays the hero, her theatrical manager. The production is quite elaborate and closes with a trial scene. The plot does not seem entirely convincing in places, but serves to entertain. The lovers are united after many tribulations.

THE COUNTESS VESCHI'S JEWELS (Vitagraph), May 16.—In two parts, a thoroughly commercial picture, except that most of the acting, the staging, background-choosing and camera work are excellent. Melodramatic but unconvincing, it keeps action going and will make an acceptable offering, for it never lags and is never obscure. Its best asset is the character drawing that many of the players have put into their roles as far as their roles would let them. Charles B. Davis is the author, but doesn't deserve credit for originality. It was produced by Ned Finley.

THE PRECIOUS TWINS (Pathe), May 16.—Two-part farce that the audience enjoyed. Its idea is old enough; but there is an astonishing amount of new stuff in it, partly due to a slight though fresh development of its situations and partly due to the two midgets (the girl very cute looking) and to the jealousy of the fat girl. This sort of farce material, which might have started with a play called "Jane," can bear repetition and is still likable. At least it is sure that the audience laughed often and liked it.

THE FRINGE ON THE GLOVE (Kalem), May 18.—In two reels, a conventional melodrama with much to commend it. There is some freshness in the atmosphere (the land of big pines in the Northwest); the story is clearly told and gets over sufficiently to hold interest; the heroine, Neva Gerber, is pretty and plays her role pleasingly, opposite to Carlisle Blackwell. R. C. Hadley plays the "heavy" role. The plot is fairly made; but how much more effective it would have been to have kept the girl out of the last scene in the office until after the husband had returned and told that he—at least this would have registered the situation more clearly and been more natural beside. The photography is fair, with exteriors a bit dark.

ADVENTURES OF KATHLYN, No. 11.—THE FORGED PARCHMENT (Selig), May 18.—The theater seems to be better liked on Kathlyn days. In quality this installment of two reels is very like the others, and it is safe that where former installments have been drawing well this will do likewise.

Independent

A BOY FOR A DAY (Royal), May 16.—A split reel that will go well as both of its offerings are laughable and have broadly humorous incidents. The first part is a rough and tumble farce with a girl enjoying a boy's escapade in boy's clothes. An amusing clown policeman helps it out.

I SHOULD WORRY (Royal), May 16.—The second part rises and develops a nice farce idea that once made a good Biograph picture—the cheeky Cheap John who is robbed by two tramps and persuades them to shoot holes in his coat until they have no more bullets. It is still good fun and this picture's producer has added to it something else, but of thinner quality.

THE MAN IN THE COUCH (Komic), May 17.—The saving grace of this release is that it purports to be nothing more than burlesque comedy. The plot starts nowhere and gets nowhere. The roughhouse antics of members of a village fire and police department may excite laughter where critical audiences are not encountered.

THE MUTUAL GIRL, No. 18 (Reliance), May 18.—Mutual Girl meets Dr. Katherine Davis, the Commissioner of Correction, and also Inez Melholland. She and her aunt also make a trip to Randall's Island, where the city of New York keeps its delinquents. These people and things are worth while seeing and help the offering. It is pretty clearly photographed.

A WATER DOG (Keystone), May 18.—A lively comedy with a plot which serves for the filming of a big human interest climax when a clever little girl swimmer is piloted safely back to shore from a rock in the ocean by a well trained dog. The photography is excellent.

THE COURTING OF PRUDENCE (Beauty), May 19.—Something unusual and unexpected is the rule in farce comedies of this brand and, in this picture, these things half hide the rather old plot. It makes a likable offering, for it has been handled in a lively way and pleasantly acted. The photograph is fair.

THE SWINDLERS (Majestic), May 19.—A dramatic release which has nothing out of the ordinary to make it command attention. A girl provides the thrills when her ingenuity thwarts the plans of a gang of crooks who have swindled her mother.

UNIVERSAL IKE IN PURSUIT OF EATS (Universal Ike), May 19.—Ike and his wife fall heir to a Western hotel and have as their guests for a night a couple with an elephant and a donkey. The rough humor in this number is very appealing; the hotel itself is a laugh and the feast of Ike and his wife to mount the elephant on a ladder is very enjoyable. They wind up in the tiger's cage. A good Western comedy.

WHEN RUEBEN FOOLED THE BANDITS (Keystone), May 21.—A corking good comedy release possessed of a well constructed plot which permits of the wildest possible kind of burlesque handling. The handling of the role of a country station agent all crippled up with rheumatism stands out.

A CIRCUS ROMANCE (Princess), May 22.—New Rochelle companies seem fond of circus pictures and usually make good ones; this is a good one though the story is slight. It has the usual circus parade, which we commend. The melodrama seems new enough and will interest and please. The photography is good.

SISTERS (Powers), May 22.—This picture is somewhat conventional as regards the plot, the theme is an old one and has been worked over in many ways. A brother of the wife is the cause of all the discord developed, the husband becoming jealous of the intimacy between the sister and brother whom he imagines is her lover. A tragedy is averted by a confession just in the nick of time, it is all very interesting and cleverly acted.

THE STRENUOUS LIFE (Joker), May 23.—A "rube" setting is shown in this comedy number. Cleo Madison plays the country girl. This lacks plot and is not very good as burlesque, so its entertaining qualities are not very great.

ACRES OF ALFALFA (Keystone), May 23.—A split-reel subject which is interesting as an advanced method of presenting educational matter. One is given a good insight into the harvesting of the West's greatest crop and, at the same time, because of the introduction of a comedy story, is amused and entertained.

OUR LARGEST BIRDS (Keystone), May 23.—On the same reel with "Acres of Alfalfa," this is another combination educational and comedy subject. The subject matter is interesting and the comedy well done.

DEAD BROKE (Crystal), May 26.—In this half reel Charlie and Vivian take turns playing dead in order to evade their creditors. It makes a fairly amusing offering.

A CHANGE OF COMPLEXION (Crystal), May 26.—This, on same reel with above, shows how a servant girl blacks up her master and mistress while they sleep. A rather diverting piece of nonsense.

THE LINK IN THE CHAIN (Eclair), May 27.—In this three-reel subject Barbara Tennant has the lead, portraying a girl who comes to poverty following the arrest and conviction of her father on evidence too slim to be convincing. Oscar Lund directs the picture and also plays opposite Miss Tennant. There is a large cast and much pains has been taken in the getting on of the production. There is a well-staged cabaret scene, for instance. The picture undoubtedly will please the majority.

SHELTERING AN INGRATE (Americana), May 27.—Typical Western picture, which hides its love interest under the rodeo atmosphere of cowboy life. Fast riding, breaking bucking horses, etc., are what it is chiefly concerned with; yet it tells an acceptable though not at all new story. The escaped convict when given a job on a ranch proves a dastard still. For a while he comes between one of the girls on the ranch and the more desirable foreman. There's good, sounds stuff in it and it is well photographed.

THE PASSING OF THE BEAST (Nestor), May 28.—In this number Wallace Reid plays the part of a Canadian woodsman—almost an animal yet possessing strong instincts for doing the right thing. There is plenty of action, but it seemed to be scattering and somewhat involved. It is not handled in the most convincing way.

CAPTAIN BILL'S WARM RECEPTION (Nestor), May 29.—The newly-weds, played by Lee Moran and Victoria Forde, fix up their home in regular sea-going fashion to entertain Uncle Bill, an old salt. The bed rocks violently and a hose is squirted through the window to make things homelike. Quite a novel idea and ones that creates considerable amusement.

THE EMBEZZLER (Kay-Bee), May 29. An old man's devotion to an invalid grandchild which leads him to steal from his employers in order that the youngster may have necessary surgical attention is pictured in this two-reeler to give it heart interest. The story will strike a responsive chord in the hearts of many who witness it. The little girl who plays the invalid grandchild is deserving of particular mention for her intelligent interpretation of a somewhat involved role.

BROTHER FOR BROTHER (Frontier), May 30.—In this film story appear the good son and the bad son. The latter robs his father's safe and the former accepts the blame. Later they meet in the West and there is a general reconciliation. Not a very new plot, but the scenes are well photographed and capably acted.

THE BAR CROSS LIAR (Eclair), May 31.—One of Eugene Manlove Rhoades' Western stories in scenario form. There is a strong idea in this, but it was brought out rather weakly in the beginning. The Western atmosphere is good and introduces a genuine chuck wagon, a Christmas dance and other features. It combines humor and pathos, but does not make the most of the plot.

SOME HERO (Crystal), May 31.—Vivien Prescott and Charlie De Forrest appear in this burlesque detective number. The hero is thrown over a cliff and the film reverses so that he rolls back again. There is some fun in this though it never becomes extremely laughable.

THE AWAKENING (Rex), May 31.—This shows the havoc wrought by a city girl artist in the country in the love affairs of a young couple. Beatrice Van is the artist and Bob Leonard and Hazel Buckham play the lovers. The story is not strong, but well constructed and entertaining.

THE STONE IN THE ROAD (Rex), May 31.—This Weber-Smalley production makes a pleasing application of the old fable of the stone placed in the roadway. The young farmer is the only one who moves it and he falls heir to the estate. A fresh, original treatment of an old theme, making an unusually pleasing production. Such pictures demonstrate the unending possibilities of this form of entertainment.

HIS HIGHNESS, THE PRINCE (Great Northern), May.—A three-reel picture, wholly amusing and filled with delicious satire; it will make a decided hit. The real fun of the offering is in its characters, of which there are many and at which it pokes convincing fun; but the plot is also very amusing. It makes a journalist, whose last name is Prince and who looks like Prince Henrick, let a comical and yet entirely human council of a small city entertain him as the prince. The prince learns of this and comes to town in his uniform; but takes it all as a good joke. It is a commendable picture in every way, acting, photography and general handling, and a very desirable offering.

Independent Specials

THE LOVER'S GIFT (Majestic), May 17.—A two-part Western melodrama with a tragic episode at its close that is a weakness; for the material of which the quite melodramatic story is built is too unrealistic to hold up the death of so important a character as the heroine's good self-sacrificing friend and helper, or to go well without the contrast of virtue justly rewarded in the end. The story is simple and engenuous; it has its usual romantic situations; is written for speed; is well acted, and holds the attention. Earle Fox plays the cowboy lover of the girl, Francillia Billington, and George Sigismond plays the big-hearted helper, who also loves the girl. It is a villainess who makes trouble and it ends in the death of George by the hand of the Earl, who should have been better protected by the story's author, W. Christie Cabanne.

THE SHEEP HERDER (Victor), May 25.—This two-part picture that contains many beautiful scenes, the most of which are taken on the Western prairies. The plot in interesting and cleverly developed. It has to do with the antipathy which exists between cowboys and sheep herders, a fact which is well known, especially among people of the West. A pretty little love story simmers through the plot. The unselfish sacrifice of the hero for his mother's sake is touching, but in the finale he wins the girl and the respect of an obdurate father and the admiration of the cowboys. This offering will please wherever shown.

THE LOST SERMON (American), May 25.—Two-part melodrama, with William Garwood as the hero, Vivian Rich as the heroine, and Jack Richardson as the villain. The first reel gets an excellent situation stated and leaves the interest wakefully expecting something good in the second reel. But the second reel proves to be quite poor and of little interest; because it was conceived in a fumbling way, throws in scenes and incidents that have no possible concern with the story, and, besides, are most improbable. It is well acted and clearly photographed.

LUCILLE LOVE (Gold Seal), Series No. 7, May 26.—Lucille and Hugo are rescued from the drifting boat by some Chinamen and taken to a Chinese town. The settings and characterizations in this are surprisingly good. Lucille dons the robes of a Chinese girl and has numerous adventures in her search for the precious papers. This number continues the interest of the series very satisfactorily.

THE WHARF RATS (Broncho), May 27.—While the "they-lived-happily-ever-after" and other conventional finishes in stories, plays, and moving pictures are often lacking in interest, it is a safe venture that the tamest and most conventional finish is more popular than is the one which leaves doubt in the mind. "The Wharf Rats" fails to satisfy for this reason. Its two reels are filled with exciting action.

HEARTS AND SWORDS (Sterling), May 28.—This is a two-part rip-roaring comedy that gains hearty and continuous laughter, it is crammed with funny situations and characters and what they don't do in the action of the picture never happened. There is a scantily clad maiden who is some dancer. Ford Sterling is at his best. This strenuous comedy will make any audience laugh lige the dickens. The photography is not of the best in some places.

A LUCKY DECEPTION (Nestor), May 30.—A two-reel number, written and produced by Al E. Christie. This is full of youthful ginger, but the treatment is too broad in parts. The restaurant scenes are a trifle too breezy and the domestic scenes tread on delicate ground. It may be cut by judicious exhibitors so that the humor of the really funny plot may be preserved. Eddie Lyons, Lee Moran and others of the Nestor comedy company appear. Eddie dresses up his chum to represent his alleged wife.

CAST ADRIFT IN THE SOUTH SEAS (Bison), May 30.—A two-reel number, written by Henry McRae, with Wm. Clifford, Marie Walcamp and Sherman Bainbridge in the cast. This story is laid in the Hawaiian Islands and has excellent qualities in the way of atmosphere and picturesque views of the natves. The story is that of a girl cast adrift in a boat by the villain and picked up by a tribe of natives. She saves the son of the chief and the rest of the scenes follow in an entertaining way. War between the tribes is a feature of the production. A pleasing release.

THE OPIUM SMUGGLERS (Box Office Attractions).—Three reels giving the adventures of a revenue detective and his wife who jointly hunt down a gang of smugglers. At the climax the revenue officers approach the stone ruin in which the gang hides near the rocky seashore and demolish it with shells from two small cannons. The blowing up of a steam tug is one of the picture's features. The hero had been left bound on it by the smugglers and had just escaped into the ocean. Before leaving him to his fate, they had carried off his wife. Thus she is able to locate their hiding place and, when she, too, escapes, to bring the officers, her husband included, to attack it. There is little in the story that is essentially new; in fact, it is rather trite; but the action keeps going. The photography is below the usual standard for the Gaumont studio, which is responsible for it.

THE RED CLUB (Box Office Attractions).—A four-part offering which is a melodrama of sensations rather than a sensational melodrama. It belongs with a clearly defined type of offering that has proved of service; but lacks all artistic quality. Its chief merit is that it keeps something going all the time. It aims to make every incident so startling that the spectator will fail to notice whether it has a reasonable place in the story or not and is full of things like traps in the floor, secret springs opening to hidden passages in castle or palace, victims hurled down chutes to strange dangers in pits or cells below, and is full of espionage and counter espionage. In the story the Red Club helps a lovelorn baroness, who things herself jilted by the reigning count, in an attempt to be revenged. The backgrounds are palaces and royal gardens in perfect keeping with the theme. It is a wholly artificial offering made with reasonable skill to fill a demand for stirring action, but lacks the kind of story that has made some of its predecessors famous. The Dansk Kinograph Studio turned it out.

PERILS OF PAULINE (Eclectic), May 18.—Pauline has an exciting adventure and is bound, gagged and hidden in the hollow of a great Chinese idol down on Mott Street. Her lover, Harry, rescues her after a lively encounter in the temple. Let us say in frankness that, while the first installment of this series promises better things than these, yet they are well produced and exciting. The serial, when taken with other offerings of its kind, is "delivering the goods."

A $14,000,000.00 Bunch of Beauty.

The Motion Picture Exhibitor

AN ANTI-CENSORSHIP BOOTH.

One of the features of the exposition of the International Motion Picture Association, to be held in Grand Central Palace from June 8 to June 13, will be an Anti-Censorship Booth, which will be in charge of a special committee. A monster petition to Congress has been prepared and will be ready for signatures the moment the exposition opens. The monster petition is a protest against the passage of the Smith-Hughes Censorship bill now pending in Congress. It is to be signed by visitors of the exposition and the text of the petition specifically recites the fact that the subscribers are regular patrons of motion picture theaters, that they are citizens of the United States and that they are not interested in any way in the production or the distribution or the exhibition of motion pictures. In this way the committee hopes to be able to prove that there is widespread approval of the pictures by the general public who visit the theaters and who are in a position to know whether pictures are on the whole clean and wholesome. This monster petition will not be signed by any one who is financially interested as either a producer, exhibitor or exchange man.

Copies of the famous message of the late Mayor Gaynor will also be distributed from the Anti-Censorship Booth. Every exhibitor may register his position on the censorship question in a book specially provided for that purpose. The committee will also distibute free of charge blanks of petitions for exhibitors to be circulated among their audiences. The plan is to invite on the screen the patrons who are opposed to censorship to sign a petition against the Smith-Hughes bill and against the principle of censorship generally.

JOE FARNHAM, TANGO EXPERT.

Mr. Joe Farnham has just been secured by the Entertainment Committee of the Convention and Exposition to referee the contests in modern dancing, by photoplayers, which will be held daily in the ballroom of the Grand Central Palace, New York City, during the week of June 8th to the 13th.

INDIANA ASSOCIATION CONVENTION CALLED.

It is announced in the call that the members will decide at this meeting whether they will attend the convention at Dayton or at New York. F. J. Rembusch, vice-president of the Indiana Association, will read a paper on perfect projection and how to obtain it. Other interesting papers will be read.

The change of date was made to enable the members to attend the Speedway races on Saturday if they so desire.

A wire from President M. A. Neff, of the National League, at Charlotte, N. C., announces the organization of state league branches in that city on May 19th for North and South Carolina. CONVENTION IN MINNESOTA.

A convention of motion picture exhibitors of Minnesota is planned to be held at Minneapolis on June 4th and 5th. Headquarters will be at the West Hotel. G. M. Westley, national organizer for the Motion Picture Exhibitors' League, has been working in that state for some time and reports that there is a strong sentiment among exhibitors in favor of the League. Minnesota delegates to the New York convention last year were among those who bolted the national convention. A new organization will be formed, officers elected and delegates to the Dayton convention chosen. Information can be obtained by addressing G. M. Westley, West Hotel, Minneapolis.

PENNSYLVANIA CONVENTION AT WILKES-BARRE.

G. C. Miller, of Plymouth, Pa., in charge of the convention committee of arrangements for the meeting of Pennsylvania exhibitors, to be held at Wilkes-Barre, Pa., on June 23rd and 24th, reports progress. Everything that can be done to make the meeting a pleasant and profitable one is being considered by the committee and an interesting time is promised to all who attend.

NO STRIFE IN OHIO LEAGUE.

On account of recent statements published in certain trade papers to the effect that there was dissatisfaction in the ranks of the Ohio State branch of the Motion Picture Exhibitors' League on account of the censor law, the Cleveland Local No. 1 has adopted a series of resolutions denouncing the statements as false and misleading and declaring that there is not now, nor ever has been strife in the Ohio Branch of the League.

Mr. MacNabb will be president and general manager of the new company, and Mr. Ball will have charge of production. Offices have been secured in the Metropolitan Building, No. 1 Madison Avenue, New York. "The Curse of Cocaine" is the title of the first picture.

REMBUSCH WINS SUIT FOR INFRINGEMENT.

In an opinion handed down by Judge Buffington, of the United States District Court for the Eastern District of Pennsylvania, sitting in Philadelphia May 19, the suit of Frank J. Rembusch, of Shelbyville, Ind., against George Bennethum, Sylvester Weis, and George Weis, charging infringement upon his patented "mirror screen" for use in the exhibition of moving pictures or stereopticon views was sustained.

Mr. Bennethum is well known in moving picture circles around Reading, Pa., where he is interested in various enterprises. Charged with having infringed upon the patent granted to Mr. Rembusch in 1909, the defendant claimed that Mr. Rembusch's patent was invalid because of a "lack of invention" and attempted to show that the same process of treating glass, namely, grinding the surface and coating the back with silver, had been known as far back as 1876. In a lengthy opinion, Judge Buffington held that while the process of treating glass had been known, there was invention on Mr. Rembusch's part when he adapted glass so treated for use as a screen on which to project pictures, disclosing the reflective value of an invisible mirror.

"The Woman of Mystery"

New Blaché Feature Deals Artistically with Wierd and Incomprehensible Things and Makes the Spectator Feel Them.

Reviewed by Hanford Chase Judson.

THE newest Blache feature, a four-reel picture, written and produced by Madame Alice Blache, gives a strongly-woven yarn of sublunary powers. We human beings live in this, our eupeptic, sunlit world as very material persons. We are awake and we see everything that goes on around us. But let us fall half asleep for a time and things that were not existent before seem to be there now. These things are to us vague, wholly imaginative. Can we, wide-awake folk of the Occident, be sure that our imaginative Oriental brothers are not more awake than we? It matters very little in our Western daylight, yet the average spectator who watches "The Woman of Mystery," by Madame Scene from "The Woman of Mystery" (Blaché).

Blaché, will more than probably be asking himself just such questions. For the picture deals with inexplicable, dreamy, yet tremendous realms in such a way that the spectator is forced to live in them for the time and in a way accept their reality without knowing that he does so. The very fact that Madame Blaché here demonstrates, unintentionally, the power of art to spellbind a person into accepting what no argument ever could, is proof conclusive of the existence in life of powers that work without clearly showing themselves.

"The Woman of Mystery" is a detective story, in kind and quality, very like "The Dream Woman," turned out by this same studio some weeks ago; but it is better. The average spectator who is avid for melodrama will never notice that now and then it relinquishes the best path, as in the torture chamber of the thieves' den, just to please him; because in doing so, it does just what he wants it to do and for him this won't hurt the impression that it makes in the least. It is a picture for all kinds of spectators, but especially for the average, intelligent man and woman who is able to understand, but doesn't like to grope too far for his or her emotion. It is never recherché: all the steps it takes are on a path easy to follow, but not well-trodden paths; there is nothing trite about it. Yet, at the same time, it is an offering also for the most thoughtful of spectators, for it takes up things that are not easily brushed aside and are likely to demand an explanation, thus stimulating thought.

The story holds out to us a cup of strange, elusive wine, harmless yet powerful and exciting. It is no easy task to make a cup to keep such a beverage from evaporating before it touches our lips. Very careful art is needed, for any suggestion of the stage or of artificial striving after effect is sure to hide the real soul of the story from us for the time and leave us dry. In this picture this seldom happens. It happens once when a great number of servitors of the strange East Indian woman capture the detective and the girl in an American backyard. There should have been fewer of them to convince us. Then the spirit of the woman had its choice of paths when sent out of her body and the horizontal way is more effective than the vertical and the contrast helps distract us from the soul of the story for a moment. These are small things in a long offering so filled with the best art—art that is magnanimous enough to sacrifice itself wholly for the sake of its object: the picture or the emotion in the spectator's heart, whichever one prefers. No one can ever get immediate credit for the true art that he or she accomplishes, for the simple reason that no one can ever see it at work. It is hidden by the veil it weaves.

That opening scene in which the actress gets the box of snakes is so unexpected and so naturally acted by Claire Whitney that the spectator is made to shudder as though he saw it in life. There are no counter suggestions to remind us of the producer or of the Solax Studio. Then the strange powers of the "Woman of Mystery" (Vinnie Burns) to send her soul out of her prison to lead to destruction the detective (Fraunie Fraunholz) who had traced back the box of snakes to her, is done unusually rather than naturally (who knows how it is done in real life?), and artfully arrests our attention just as the real event would arrest it, if we should see such a thing. The story follows on through melodrama, but it is good melodrama and makes entertainment of a high order. The offering is desirable. The staging and photography are careful and adequate—a fine picture.

Miss Fri'zi Brunette

MISS FRITZI BRUNETTE, whom many critics have declared to be the most beautiful star in the motion picture firmament, recently turned down a very flattering offer to accompany a well-known star feature producing company to Europe.

Miss Brunette, who formerly appeared in a prominent brand of pictures released by the Universal Film Company, says she prefers to remain in the United States even if this country does go to war with Mexico. "No matter how hard the times may become as the result of a great or long protracted war," commented Miss Brunette, "I do not believe the demand for motion picture entertainment will fall off even a tiny bit. The great strain and worry caused by the war will increase the yearning of the people for mental relaxation, and though money may be so scarce or 'tight' as to hurt other industries and amusements, the picture show at from five to twenty-five cents admission will seem so little in comparison to other things that people will go to it stronger than ever. You know the old law of physics, that great pressures attack the point of least resistance—well, that's the law that will apply to the American people, their tense pent up feelings during war times, and the good old American motion picture show.

"No, siree, I'm not afraid of panics, because there isn't going to be any in our line of work, no matter what the wise ones say to the contrary, and I want to be right here and work with the American companies and the American players—the finest, most honest and generous folks on the face of the earth. I have one nice 'Home' offer here which I am considering, but haven't yet made up my mind."

Now that Miss Brunette has announced her intention to return to motion pictures, she will doubtless have many offers to choose from as she is a highly talented actress and very popular with the fans everywhere.

THE BROADWAY SECURES THOMAS E. SHEA.

The second release of the Broadway Picture Producing Company will feature Thomas E. Shea in "The Man-o'-Warsman; or, The Fall of Vera Cruz," a five-reel story written around recent happenings in Mexico. The picture will be issued on July 10. "The Trail of the Lonesome Pine," the Broadway's first picture, which will be released on June 10, is practically completed, and is said to be a winner.

Ramo Releases Another Lively Story Full of Dramatic Incidents to Fill Today's Demand for Melodrama.

Reviewed by Hanford C. Judson.

SOME restraint is necessary in praising these multiple-reel melodramas. In their collection of sensational experiences, one following the other, they show lack of artistic balance and really sacrifice final impression for the sake of a number of thrills that are felt and forgotten. This is the day of tremendous engineering feats and of startling political experiments and the pictures that will suit people who do these things must be thrilling. Now these melodramas are on the right track; they are the nearest thing to what is really wanted and there is no doubt that they are popular. They ought to come a bit closer to life; more time and care ought to be taken to make the steps in their progress inevitable; and their characters ought to be more consistently human. Of course, there are degrees in all things and we find this newest Ramo feature, a four-reel melodrama, called "Thou Shalt Not," above the average. The Ramo studio is not turning out a big feature every week and all of its offerings that we have seen so far have shown care and earnest effort to make their stories seem real. "Thou Shalt Not," in its snap and go, in the naturalness with which most of its action is presented, and in the convincing way in which its emotions are pictured, reminds us of other Ramo products, known to many and of proven popularity. It will be popular, we feel sure. Yet, while better than most, it shares in the weaknesses of its kind. It was written and produced by Will H. Davis and Edith Hallor, Stewart Holmes, Harry Collier and others of the regular Ramo company play it. In photography, compared with earlier Ramo pictures, it falls down a bit. The cameraman was too boldly experimental. He deserves praise—many of his studio scenes show the wide spaces of all out-doors in a truly marvelous way; but some of his boldest attempts are failures; of such are his running pictures and one of his camp fire scenes.

The story is set in the Northwest with its wild passions, its miners, lucky and otherwise, the mounted police, gamblers, drinking places, cabins and all the rest. It is new, although not made of new things and holds attention well. At its opening, we find a prospector in hard luck. His wife is living with his father within a few days' ride of his camp. He has two neighbors who are lucky and whom he has saved from outlaws. By one of these he sends a note to his wife about his bad luck. She is weak and is very quickly attracted by the messenger, who proves to be a married man and really her brother-in-law, although neither knows it. There's a spirited and excellently produced pistol fight in and around the village gin-mill. The messenger holds off outlaws; is wounded and is cared for by the luckless prospector's wife. His father sees that the two have fallen in love and sits up with a rifle to keep him from carrying her off. The old man is shot. The son finds the letter, that had been scribbled to his wife, in the dead man's hand and starts in pursuit. He overtakes the two and there's a third vigorous struggle with a novel outcome in which the seducer dies accidentally. The eloping wife is sick. Her husband watches till morn; when seeing her dead he leaves her. The seducer's partner coming, steals the dead man's gold and accuses the absent husband of taking it. The dead man's widow sends her brother out to "get" the prospector; but he has changed his name and the two meet and become good friends. In trying to protect his youthful chum from the wiles of a gambler's girl decoy he attracts the gambler's notice and is recognized. He flees away on horseback. Wounded, he is taken in and cared for by the widow of the dead man, his sister-in-law, who soon gets a description from her brother and sends for the Royal Mounted Police. But before they come he, having fallen in love with her, tells her his story and shows his proof. She helps him escape and then follows to take care of him.

JOHN J. NOECKER DIES SUDDENLY.

It is with regret we chronicle the death of John J. Noecker, which occurred in St. Louis, Sunday, May 17th. A telegram announcing his sudden demise, received at the home office of Warner's Features, Inc., states that Noecker was stricken on the 15th, and that death came quickly.

For a number of years Noecker was manager of the Swanson-Crawford Film Exchange in St. Louis, and was one of the pioneer representatives of the film industry in the middle west. Several months ago Noecker became affiliated with Warner's Features, Inc., in the capacity of manager of their St. Louis branch. His sudden death will be regretted by a host of friends throughout the trade.

"CABIRIA" AT THE KNICKERBOCKER.

Werba & Luescher, theatrical managers, have secured the exhibition rights for the Itala feature, "Cabiria," for America, and will give the first public presentation of that 12-reel masterpiece at the Knickerbocker Theater, Broadway and 37th Street, New York, on Monday, June 1st. Signor Scamenga, of the Itala Company, is in New York and will remain for the opening at the Knickerbocker. The tour of "Cabiria" will be conducted along the same lines as that of a first-class dramatic production.

Herbert Rawlinson

HERBERT RAWLINSON is working under the direction of Otis Turner, with whom he was associated at the Selig Studios, and is appearing with the Universal's Special Feature Company as lead.

Mr. Rawlinson has much to commend him; he is very popular with the public; he is good-looking, optimistic and young. Add to this manliness and the ability to wear his clothes as though they belonged to him and it will readily be seen that he has a brilliant future before him, for he also possesses personality that "gets over."

Herbert Rawlinson.

He is young, but he has had the hard knocks and the heartaches which nearly every actor worth his salt has experienced. And, moreover, he has won his way, step by step, by sheer will power and ability. His parents were not professionals and he started out on his own hook early in life.

Born at Brighton on the south coast of England, Rawlinson swam like a fish and rode to hounds at an early age. His education was acquired in France. While in his early 'teens the buyer for a well-known Toronto merchant took a great liking to Herbert and persuaded his father to let him go to Canada, after pointing out the advantages of the Americas. He came, and the spirit of the new country soon dominated him.

In a small Canadian town, Herbert hung around the opera house until the opportunity came. He joined a repertoire road show, and the manager, noting his natural ability, soon gave him leads. Salary started at six dollars a week. When he left he was receiving the biggest salary in the company. Then followed a succession of stock and road companies, principally out of Chicago, in which he played melodrama productions. Then came a season in B. C. Whitney's "Show Girl," after which Herbert Rawlinson invaded New York and played there and out of there several seasons.

The desire to settle down came, and with it the opportunity to join Selig's company, with which firm he remained for two and a half years, playing a great variety of parts, principally heavies and leads.

When Hobart Bosworth got his company together for Jack London's "Sea Wolf," he selected Rawlinson for the important part of Humphrey Van Weyden, and persuaded him to join the company. Herbert did, and the wisdom of the choice is evident to all who may see the "Sea Wolf." And now the once popular Selig player is a member of the Universal, and his score is considerably enlarged.

In private life Mr. Rawlinson has a host of friends. He still takes an active interest in athletics, which embraces gymnastics, swimming, riding and rowing.

"On the Verge of War," a big, three-reel 101 Bison Mexican war drama, to be released June 6th, shows Mr. Rawlinson doing splendid work in the leading male role. "Won in the Clouds" is another big feature recently released in which he starred. Anna Little is now playing opposite Mr. Rawlinson.

"THE ESCAPE" COMING.

Arrangements are fast being completed for the New York presentation of "The Escape," D. W. Griffith's latest masterpiece. This is a special seven-reel Griffith Mutual picture produced with an exceptionally competent cast including Blanche Sweet, Mae Marsh, Ralph Lewis, Donald Crisp, Owen Moore, Robert Harron, Jack Pickford and F. A. Turner. It will be presented in New York as a theatrical attraction at the Cort Theater, June 1.

One unusual factor will contribute to the excellence of the picture as it will be seen at its first metropolitan presentation. It was first shown recently at Clune's Theater, Pasadena, Cal., and at the Auditorium, Los Angeles, always the home of grand opera, high class drama and symphony, also owned by W. H. Clune. It was most enthusiastically welcomed at both theaters and hailed as the greatest photoplay ever produced. Mr. Griffith himself feels it is his greatest work, surpassing his former successes such as "Judith of Bethulia," "The Battle of Elderbush Gulch" and "The Messenger."

But the important thing as regards the producing end is that the appreciation of the audience was carefully noted and several changes made in the picture. It has always been the complaint of motion picture producers that a theatrical production was constantly being changed to suit the audience, but that a photoplay always remained as it was sent out before receiving a public presentation. Mr. Griffith's latest innovation seems to do away with this. It is another instance of thoroughness of the methods of the master producer.

Lorimore in a New Field.

ALEC LORIMORE, who counts every film man in the country for a friend and whose work for the Gaumont Company has been phenomenally successful, has made a new connection. He has been secured by the Box Office Attraction Company for the purpose of organizing and extending its growing feature film service. This new department of the Box Office Attraction Company has been created by Abe Carlos, under whose care it is.

Alec. Lorimore.

The demands upon the department have been very heavy and the Box Office Attraction Company is fortunate in having obtained the services of such a thorough organizer and film expert as Mr. Lorimore has proven himself to be. He is versatile and resourceful, being not only a born organizer whom experience has developed into a master of his profession, but he has done remarkably fine work as a publicity man, combining originality with the right kind of a "punch." The Gaumonts regret the loss of Mr. Lorimore, with whose work they were thoroughly satisfied. Mr. Lorimore will enter upon his new duties as expeditiously as possible. He will make a tour of the entire country in the interest of his new employer. He will not only sell state rights, but dispose of the exhibition rights of some very fine productions on a special basis. His many friends wish the genial film expert the greatest possible success in his new field for which he is so eminently equipped.

PROVIDENCE, R. I., TO GET BIG HOUSE.

The Allen Hippodrome Corporation, Providence, R. I., is to build and operate in that city a big moving picture and vaudeville house which will be known as the Allen Hippodrome. It is planned to have about 5,000 seats. The company is composed of Charles Allen, president, and his son, Charles, Jr., treasurer. These men also own and operate the New Union, Scenic and La Sirena Theaters in Providence and the Scenic in Pawtucket, R. I. The Allen Hippodrome Corporation has a capital of $200,000.

PARIS LETTER.

(Special Correspondence to THE WORLD.)

PARIS was Abe Warner's last calling place prior to embarking for the United States. The president of Warner's Features passed an enjoyable and profitable few days in the gay city and left for home the richer for a fine feature film which he was able to purchase here.

He is touring Europe with a Lubin film, which demonstrates his firm's method of high speed tire making. The pictures show the process of manufacture from the treating of raw rubber to the finished tire. People who saw the film highly lauded the pictures and the Thropp company's initiative in calling in the movies to help sell their goods.

For the first time a British picture has topped the bill at the great Gaumont Palace Hippodrome. The film was the London Film Company's "House of Temperley." It had a great reception and Gaumont screened it the second week at Gaumontcolor in the Faubourg Montmartre.

At the time of writing "Fantomas, the False Magistrate," is packing the Palace Hippodrome. This is Gaumont's most popular series. Americans in Paris always turn out in large numbers to see the pictures. A few days ago a well-known American made up a "Fantomas" party and booked seven boxes for the accommodation of his friends.

Official receipts just published show the advancing popularity of the movies. In 1913 twenty-four Paris picture theaters took more than a million and half dollars in entrances. Takings at Gaumont's Palace Hippodrome exceeded $398,000, which sum was only eclipsed by one vaudeville show—the Folies Bergeres. It should be mentioned that the Hippodrome is closed during the summer months. Gross receipts of Kaffenburgh's American Theater totaled approximately $33,299 out of the total takings of theaters, music halls and movies a million and a half dollars was collected in poor rights by the Assistance Public.

My Vienna correspondent writes that the Eclair Company created a big sensation by photographing before the public the main incident in a forthcoming drama. The firm arranged for Solange d'Atalide, an American circus rider appearing at the Busch Circus, to ride a horse on the roof of one of the cars of the Big Wheel. The equestrienne trained her mount, "Dreadnought," for the perilous feat by riding on the top of a moving van. The thousands of people who turned out to see the event were kept in a state of breathless excitement while the Big Wheel revolved and the cameramen took pictures from precarious positions on the axle.

JOHN CHER.

JACOB P. ADLER IN THEIR FIRST PRODUCTION.

Jacob P. Adler, well known romantic actor, plays the title role in "Michael Strogoff," a five-part feature which will be released June 1 as the first product of the Popular Plays and Players, Inc. Mr. Adler has a repertoire of more than one hundred speaking plays, but felt that "Michael Strogoff" was best adapted for his appearance on the screen. The picture will contain many spectacular features, among them the blinding of Michael Strogoff, the burning of Moscow, the river ablaze as the fugitives escape by raft, the burning of Irkutsk, the big Tartar camp at Bokhara, and the big court and palace scenes.

In support of Mr. Adler there will be seen a cast specially selected from the popular Lubin players, as the picture is being produced on a very pretentious scale by the Lubin Film Manufacturing Company.

Feature Producers Affiliate.

Alliance Formed by Famous Players, Lasky and Bosworth, Inc., with Leading American Feature Distributers.

ONE of the most important announcements of a week in the motion picture industry which will long be remembered as notable for its important coalitions comes from the offices of the Jesse L. Lasky Feature Film Company, the Famous Players Film Company and Bosworth, Inc.

These three big organizations, each well known as a producer of dignified and high-class photoplay features, have effected a working agreement whereby their products will be marketed through a common distributing agency which has been formed with the title of the Paramount Picture Corporation. The capitalization of the big distributing company is given as sufficient to handle programs of the kind which the interested companies are turning out from time to time, and, in addition to being large enough to meet the requirements of the new corporation law, is, by comparison, insignificant as regards the actual capitalization of the concern.

W. W. Hodkinson.

William W. Hodkinson has been elected president and general manager of the new company. James Steel, of the Famous Players Film Service, Inc., of Pittsburgh and Chicago, is vice-president of the company, and Raymond Pawley, of the Famous Players Exchange, Asbury Park, N. J., is secretary and treasurer. The directors include Hiram Andrews, of the Master Productions Film Company, Boston, Mass., and William L. Sherry, of the William L. Sherry Feature Film Company.

Bosworth, Inc., producers of the film versions of Jack London's celebrated works; the Famous Players Film Co., with their program of leading stars in recognized dramatic successes, and the Jesse L. Lasky Feature Film Co., producers of well-known dramatic successes and famous novels with recognized stars at the head, have been making some of the most representative and pretentious feature productions obtainable.

It is with the object of delivering the productions of these three big producers and distributing them through the one channel, and also adding to these productions the subjects of other master producers which measure up to the standard set by the three companies above named, thus allowing the exhibitor to secure from the one central point a program of sufficient caliber and consistent standard, so that he can go on day after day showing pictures of an assured sterling grade that the Paramount Company has been organized along these lines.

Adolph Zukor.

It is made conditional that the standard set by Lasky, Bosworth and the Famous Players must be met by other producers if they would have a place on the program to be distributed by the Paramount Pictures Corporation, and, as these three companies contemplate the creation of only 102 productions a year, the Paramount Pictures Corporation will have experts in all the leading producing marts of the world seeking out material of sufficient strength to be affiliated with the productions of the Famous Players, Bosworth and Lasky, thus completing a comprehensive feature program.

The primary purpose of the Paramount Pictures Corporation, it is set forth, is to supply the exhibitor with a program of such advanced standard as to elevate, dignify and perpetuate the exhibiting branch of the industry in all parts of the world.

By placing it on this basis, it is pointed out, the exhibitor is encouraged to conduct his show in a businesslike manner. If he desires, for instance, to run a week of celebrated plays and famous novels, with notable stars, the Paramount Pictures Corporation will be the central point through which he can obtain his program, whereas at present it is necessary for the exhibitor at any given point to work through some half-dozen different distributing agencies, and then his program is jeopardized by the possibility of securing films of uneven merit.

Hobart Bosworth.

This combination of these three important feature producers with the Paramount Pictures Corporation represents the first organized, co-operative system established for the production and distribution of the highest class feature program, and is the culmination of several years of experience and observation on the part of the various members of the organization. Messrs. Lasky, Zukor and Garbutt explain the combination with this brief statement: "A desire for the uplift of the industry and the further prestige of the feature film."

Jesse L. Lasky.

The several companies interested in this combination are quite well known to the trade. The Famous Players Film Company is the older, and has quite a few notable productions to its credit. Among its players are Little Mary Pickford, and a number of theatrical stars such as Mrs. Fiske and James K. Hackett have appeared in its productions. Edwin Porter is the chief director and Fred Thompson has recently joined the producing forces.

The Lasky Company made its bow to the public a few months ago with "The Squaw Man," in which Dustin Farnum was featured. Edward Abeles was afterward featured in "Brewster's Millions," and other leading actors have appeared before the camera in popular productions for Lasky. The Bosworth Company is headed by Hobart Bosworth as president and Frank A. Garbutt, a wealthy San Francisco sportsman, as treasurer. This company's first production is "The Sea Wolf," from Jack London's story of the same title. It will produce other London stories.

Messrs. Hodkinson, Steele and Sherry are exchange and feature renters and have considerable experience in that branch of the business. Altogether the combination is a particularly strong one.

A CORRECTION.

The big Burland Theater in the Bronx is controlled by the Midas Amusement Company, which is composed of David V. Ficker, Nathan Machet and Isaac Picker. The managers of the house are Nathan Machet and Isaac Picker. A statement in the Moving Picture World last week contrary to the foregoing was due to misinformation.

The Temple Theater has done a capacity business for eight years.

COSTELLO THEATER.

On Wednesday evening, May 20th, in New York City, a new and very elaborate theater was opened at 159th Street and Broadway. It is one of the largest in the city, and named "The Costello,' after the celebrated Vitagraph star, Maurice Costello. Mr. Costello appeared at the opening personally, and was given an ovation. The beautiful show place was crowded to the doors and many persons were turned away, disappointed in not seeing the moving picture hero. Mr. Costello arrived at the theater in his large touring car, accompanied by his wife and children. As the machine drew up at the curb, the crowd, pressing their way into the new structure, heard somebody exclaim, "There he is now." Immediately he was surrounded by a gaping throng who gazed in open eyed wonder when it was whispered around that the beautiful woman and two children in the car were his family. The play presented was the Broadway Star Feature, "Mr. Barnes, of New York," in which Maurice Costello is the star.

Eleanor Gates in Photoplay Field

ELEANOR GATES, author and playwright, has organized a photoplay company which will produce on the screen her books, plays, and stories. She is one of the first authors, as well as one of the first women, to head her own motion picture producing company.

The works of Miss Gates are well-known in the literary and dramatic world. She is the author of "The Biography of a Prairie Girl," "The Plow Woman," "Cupid, the Cow Punch," and "The Poor Little Rich Girl." The latter was a great success, both as a book and a play, and the other titles were all "best sellers" as novels. Besides her stories and plays, she has written numerous stories and one-act sketches.

Eleanor Gates.

"I believe that the possibilities of the motion picture are just being realized," says Miss Gates. "As much art can be put into a picture as into a story or a play, and with the whole world available as a setting, the limits of the legitimate theater disappear and the author is unhampered. The last few months have seen a great change for the better in motion pictures. At first they were a novelty, a new wonder of the world. The first pictures made for the purpose of telling a story or showing a drama were crude and elemental, action being the chief requisite. A new day has come, and a new art is being developed which brings into play all the skill, ingenuity and creative power of cameraman, director, actor, and writer. It is my ambition that the Eleanor Gates Photo-Play Company, of which I am president, will keep abreast of this advance in ideals and ideas in this new art. Our motto is not many photo-dramas, but good ones."

The first releases will be three and four-reel features made from stories by Miss Gates, which appeared in the Saturday Evening Post, with a cast of actors and actresses who are of the types Miss Gates had in mind when she wrote the stories.

The studios of the company are at Mt. Kisco, New York. Richard Garrick is director.

The company is not in the market for scenarios, since Miss Gates' novels, plays, and short stories will take a long time to produce. The office of the company is at No. 2 East 58th Street.

Mr. Hamilton is an old picture man, having been in the business for a period of eight years.

Efficient Publicity Work

By Julian T. Baber.

IT HAS been editorially pointed out in the motion picture press that there is danger lurking in newspaper publicity for certain films unless it is worked out on a certain basis—referring to that employed by a combination of well-known producers. The danger that may crowd around such an experiment is of such small consequence as to preclude any possibility of detrimental influence on the disposition of certain films, if the proper methods are employed by the publicity agents of the concerns which desire publicity as a means of information for the fandom of the screen.

Oftentimes it is the case that the "readers" which are prepared for the daily press by different producers are written in haste and with little thought of the effect that may follow in the wake of this publicity if diverted into channels that are not selected with a view to producing the best results. It would be the height of folly for any producer to advertise a picture with the idea of interesting the public to such an extent as to create a demand, and then not be able to deliver the goods in accordance with expectations. Indeed, it would show a lack of foresight which would be inconsistent with business principles, and any company that allowed itself to fall into such a rut should be prepared to suffer the consequences.

The phenomenal interest which the general public is taking in motion pictures is pleasing to the eyes of the interests which are in position to cater to the wants of the enthusiasts.

No better medium to inform these same enthusiasts can be imagined than the daily newspaper, and the producer who is able to induce an editor to take most of the literature pertaining to his product is blazing his way to success through a forest of difficulties which can be explored only by persistency of effort in this direction. The assertion is ventured here, not with the idea of leaving the impression that newspaper publicity is alone responsible for the popularity of certain films, but for the reason that the press is well-known in all business enterprises as a most satisfactory agency for disseminating information among the masses.

The newspaper, as it is well-known, reaches a class of people who are interested in the pictures and who do not have an opportunity to scan the pages of the many journals devoted to the entertainment in which they are interested as spectators. Most newspapers are conducting special departments in which new releases and personal news concerning players and their hobbies are printed every day. This is eagerly gobbled up by the reader who is interested in the "movies," and it enables him to familiarize himself with different screen stars and speak with authority concerning the brands which make the strongest appeal to him at the theaters.

There are several producers who have adopted plans by which they get in the good graces of the newspaprs which carry the data relative to their products. They have sheets printed with a view to making easy the task of the editor in using his shears and the paste pot, and, generally speaking, the news is written up to conform with the policy of the various papers. There are other producers, however, who have not yet learned the ways of the newspaper game. The efforts of their publicity men are of little value for the reason that the literature that they mail out invariably finds its way to the waste basket of the discriminaing editor.

No editor wants a long sheet of yellow paper with news of little import mimeographed thereon in an ink that is so faint as to create the belief that the writer is trying to practise the theory of economy. Copy thus prepared occupies too much space for newspaper men to consider for an instant, and the sooner this is realized the sooner the publicity departments of the concerns employing this style will appreciate the importance of working out another system of winning the favor of the daily press. Long, detailed accounts of happenings, and other stories that could be made short and more effective, are not wanted by the newspapers. Short, snappy paragraphs, an inch or two in length are always desirable, and when printed in regular form on good paper stock make good space-fillers for the man on the desk.

Another well-known concern, which publishes a house-organ, has a plan which is useful only in so far as the organ reaches those on the individual mailing this concern has prepared. The paragraphs are not in shape to be used in a newspaper because of the style used by the writer in making known the product of this particular company.

There must be a uniformity of style before the publicity men can hope to get the results through the newspapers in their efforts to interest the public in motion pictures without leaving the impression that the literature is nothing more than the product of an advance agent. It can be advertising in the guise of legitimate news if the writer knows how to prepare his copy, and this latter feature is one that cannot be too greatly emphasized as a big factor in the efficiency of real publicity work.

ENLARGING EDISON STUDIO.

Many Changes Being Made in the Bronx Establishment—Added Facilities for Players and Directors.

WHEN the Edison studio building in The Bronx, New York City, was seriously damaged by fire, a rumor gained circulation that the plant would be moved to Orange, N. J. This was quickly denied, and now plans have been completed for extensive and permanent improvements of The Bronx studio that will make it one of the most convenient in America. Already many changes calculated to increase the efficiency of the working force have been made, and soon a new concrete structure of four floors will be erected on the Decatur Avenue side to provide adequate and suitable offices and dressing rooms for the directors and players.

The glass studio structure which was damaged by the recent fire is being repaired. Manager Plimpton's offices, which were on the Oliver Place side, in the rear, have been moved to the second floor of the Decatur Avenue side, affording more room and greater convenience. In the basement, where the property room and garage were formerly located, is a complete photographic department for the development and printing of negative and positive film. It is, indeed, a complete film factory, and handles thirty thousand feet of finished product each week. Other material changes have been made which greatly increase the efficiency of the plant.

As soon as the work is under way, Manager Plimpton intends to take up his interrupted trip abroad, which will be about June 1. He will visit the principal European motion picture centers, and will probably be absent about two months.

C. B. PRICE.

IT IS doubtful if any other firm ever entered the Coast field and made a greater success in a corresponding length of time than the World Film Corporation has made. And much of this success must be credited to the untiring energy of its special representative in this territory, C. B. Price, who took charge shortly after the opening of the Coast offices.

C. B. Price.

Mr. Price is not a stranger in this territory, having for several years been with the General Film Company, and until recently manager of the Los Angeles branch of that concern. He has covered the entire Coast territory many times, and is possessed of a fund of first-hand information. His experience has not been confined to this territory; in fact, he is as well known in the east as he is here, having done special office and outside work at a dozen branches of the General Film Co.

The slogan of Mr. Price is "Something doing every minute," and he has lived up to this since establishing his headquarters at San Francisco. Practically every exhibitor in the territory hears from the World Film Corporation at least once a week, and in a manner a little out of the ordinary. This hustling manager does not wait for some one else to dig up a new business-getting plan, but originates his own, and by the time others are commencing to copy this he has a new one in operation. The Coast is glad that Price is to stay there, and Price likes the Coast, too. Fine combination, that.

GOLDBERG JOINS VITAGRAPH.

The Vitagraph Company has arranged with Goldberg, the famous cartoonist of the New York Evening Mail, to furnish a series of comedies that will be classed among the Vita-laughs. His first script will be entrusted to Ralph Ince, the Vitagraph director, for production. These Goldberg Vita-laughs are of the crisp, snappy and swift variety that will set pace for a new era of comedy to delight.

Primagraf's New Leading Lady

TODAY the feature buyer demands just a little more than the celluloid film and the sensational paper that accompanies it; he demands that the feature must have some extraordinary drawing power and it was for that purpose that the Primagraf Film Company engaged the world famous prima donna, Julia DeKelety, who is considered one of the greatest character actresses on the European stage today.

Julia DeKelety.

A few years ago she played in Paris and was the rage for over three months, appearing at the leading concert and music halls. In England she scored one of her greatest triumphs, and was persuaded to come to the United States and appear in this country. Irving Billig, the managing director of the Primagraf Film Co., knew Miss DeKelety in Europe and when he saw her here he lost no time in getting her to sign a contract "to pose for pictures" as he put it. And today finds her one of the most talked of leads in motion pictures.

The trade and daily papers, in fact all the papers throughout the country have given her extended notice in their news columns and published her photographs, some of the papers going so far as to run her photo on the front cover of their publications. Which all goes to prove that the state right buyers are going to get the extra "drawing power" that they demand, especially when they buy Primagraf Features.

The next feature in which this star will appear will be a three-reel comedy from the pen of the well known author-director, Irving Billig, entitled, "Oh, that Movie," which is now nearing completion, and will be released in about three weeks.

Frank Donovan is also with this concern, looking after the publicity end; he needs no introduction to the trade as everybody knows him.

PLANS READY FOR BIDS.

The plans of the motion picture theater to be built on an 18,000 foot site in one of the suburbs of Boston by the Littlefield Trust of 26 Boston Fruit & Produce Exchange, Boston, Mass., are now ready for bids. The structure is to be built of brick and stone and will be one of the finest picture houses in the suburb in which it is to be built.

Getting Belasco Atmosphere

Mr. Wilfred Buckland Engaged by the Jesse L. Lasky Company to Stage Its Future Productions.

THE Jesse L. Lasky Feature Play Company has engaged the services of Wilfred Buckland, who for ten years has been associated with David Belasco. He was Belasco's first producing assistant at the time when the Belasco productions were on an enormous spectacular scale. He has had years of daily training as an actor, stage manager, and technical director in the companies of Augustin Daly, Daniel Frohman's Old Lyceum Theater, Charles Frohman's Empire Theater company and later in the companies of Mrs. Fiske, Maude Adams and Henry W. Savage. Mr. Buckland has achieved a good deal of success as a decorative artist and as an electrical expert in stage lighting. Some of the best known modern devices in stage lighting now in general use, such as the incandescent or "baby" spotlight, were originated by Mr. Buckland. Mr. Buckland is the artistic director of the play, "Omar, the Tent-Maker."

Wilfred Buckland.

Mr. Buckland is going to Los Angeles in the near future, where he will devote himself to a thorough study of the artistic possibilities of the screen. These possibilities, he thinks, are far from being exhausted. He thinks that too many of the pictures produced today are either altogether too conventional and made according to stereotyped formulae, or else lacking in that element of art which proclaims the quality of a great painting to every human eye, and hopes eventually to produce a film which will stand out for its superior art. He has in addition to his numerous other qualifications having been a painter for many years and he believes that the director who sees the picture as the painter would see it is capable of doing great things on the screen.

Mr. Buckland has carte blanche from the company which has engaged him and he will be hampered by no conditions. He can follow his own peculiar artistic bent and go as far as he likes on the road of originality.

GRAND JUNCTION, COLO., TO HAVE HANDSOME THEATER.

The Rex Amusement Company, of Grand Junction, Colo., has purchased the Majestic Theater in that city and will begin immediately to transform it into a modern picture theater. The Rex Company is composed of William H. Swanson, president; A. R. Wilson, vice-president, and Harry T. Nolan, secretary and treasurer. The exterior will be of flat white stucco with trimmings in old copper. The entrance arch will be 22 feet wide and 26 feet high. The Louis XV style of architecture will predominate throughout the exterior. An unobstructed view of the picture from any seat in the house will be had, and the name of the renovated house will probably be the Rex.

THEATER CHANGES HANDS.

C. W. Joehrendt, of Campbellsville, Ky., has taken over the picture house in that city which was formely owned by R. Hobson. Mr. Joehrendt has given the house a new front. He has purchased a Power's 6-A machine and has installed the indirect lighting system.

HIS LAST CHANCE (Imp).

How would it make you feel to kidnap a man for a joke, leave him a prisoner in some deserted house or barn, and then read in the papers the next morning that your victim had been found dead? Truly it would be a case of the stinger stung—stung to the extent of having the electric chair or life imprisonment facing one. And that is exactly what happens to the hero—a young reporter—in this tremendously thrilling melodrama. The young reporter, wasting his time at cards, has been given one more chance to make good with a story. One of his friends suggests the scheme of kidnapping a certain millionaire and then using the story as a "beat." But their joke turns to bitter tragedy —and the mystery of the millionaire's death is not explained until the very end.

Scene from "His Last Chance" (Imp).

It is one of the best modern melodramas done in a long time—suspense, action, plot and great climaxes there are, besides some great acting. Alexander Gaden and Leah Baird are seen in the lead roles, and they do some splendid work. Hobart Henley plays the part of the millionaire and then doubles as the millionaire's twin brother who helps to run the crime down. He does some of the best work since his affiliation with the Imp as a lead. But perhaps the star part must be attributed to W. J. Ferguson, the well known Broadway actor, who is seen as the quiet, smooth, mysterious butler.

Mr. Ferguson was secured especially for this role and paid a big price. Mr. Ferguson's last appearance on the stage was with Fannie Ward in "Madam President," in which he scored a big success. The present photoplay is worth seeing, if for nothing else than Mr. Ferguson's unusual acting.

Frank Crane is the director of the piece, while Stuart Paton, his assistant, and author of many successful photoplays, is the author.

EASTERN FACTORY FOR ATSCO.

Frank T. Highfield, sperintendent of the Atsco factory at St. Louis, Mo., makers of the Radium Gold Fibre Screen, is now in New York for the purpose of selecting a site for an Eastern plant, projected by the Atsco concern. The Eastern factory will have 20,000 square feet of floor space and will be devoted exclusively to the manufacture of Radium Gold Fibre screens and is designed to take care of the Eastern and European trade.

The new Atsco catalog — a high-class production of 184 pages—has just been issued. It covers every need of the motion picture exhibitor, from tickets to screen, and is a compendium of information on the subject of picture theater equipment. 218 West 42nd Street, New York, is the company's address.

"THE MAN IN THE CELLAR" (Films Lloyds).

About the best way to make criminals mad is to take them, supposedly, for a ride, and then wheel them into a police station. The most kindly tempered criminal will feel offended at this.

This is the trick pulled by Webb, the detective in "The Man in the Cellar," the second of the series. As in "The Black Triangle," there are three crooks and their maneuvers make an interesting and intricate study for this super-clever sleuth. They had a very good chance of "getting away with it" if the dog had not whined—but the dog did whine and so got upon the nerves of the lady next door that she started the investigation that lead to the undoing of a wonderfully clever plot.

We have seen criminals get out of all kinds of difficult situations, but there is one in this feature which is novelty itself. After having been bound hand and foot, the crook waits until his captors have gone and then swings his feet out over a table on which stands a lighted candle. He holds the thongs which bind him over the flame and they are quickly burnt through. He then puts the cords which bind his wrist over the candle. The candle flame swerves in the breeze and scorches his hand, but it cuts the cord and he is free—to do more mischief.

The theme of an assumed identity runs through the story and the Lady Grace almost commits the embarrassing error of marrying an impostor who resembles the real Lord Rawson, her fiance.

There is a plot within a plot. The conspirators accidentally gain possession of valuable plans of a new rapid-firing gun, doubling Webb's task. There are surprises every few minutes and the unexpected is happening always. "The Man in the Cellar" fills to the letter the high expectations aroused by "The Black Triangle."

"THE AIR TORPEDO" (Warner's Features).

Here is a story out of the beaten path; not merely a conveniently arranged plot for the introduction of an aeroplane, but a gripping drama of thrills interwoven about the theft of an aeroplane attachment, that is intended for use in war times.

This marvelous device, the invention of a noted general, drops bombs with deadly accuracy upon hostile fleets and land forces. The secret of its success is zealously guarded by the inventor. How he puts it into use to destroy the boat used by the escaping spies, furnishes a climax of thrills that words cannot describe.

"THE RUMMAGE SALE" (Selig).

There is something peculiarly pathetic in observing a type of a day that has gone by trying to meet the current call of fashion. It is generally allotted to the eternal feminine to be tortured with this class of heartache, but in the case of the quaint Selig playlet, entitled, "The Rummage Sale," mere man plays the part for pity, but triumphs in the end. The dress suit is one of the essentials that every man who is any man must have for functions or stand aside. Old-fashioned Septimus feels the call of society and gets a dress suit at a rummage sale, so that he becomes a "mark" at a reception, and the pretty, mischievous girls further make game of him by "tagging" his clothes. He, however, so appeals to Aunt Salina, a maiden lady of uncertain years and much wealth, that she takes him for better or for worse, and gets the best of it—for her declining years. William Hutchinson plays Septimus Snow; the mischievous Rose Greely is impersonated by Stella Razeto, and Lillian Hayward is Miss Selina Richards. "The Rummage Sale" is released May 3rd.

FAMOUS PLAYERS PRODUCE "SPITFIRE"

The Famous Players Film Company will shortly present Carlyle Blackwell in a four-reel film version of the famous nautical comedy-drama "The Spitfire," by Edward Peple, the author of the current theatrical success, "A Pair of Sixes."

"The Spitfire" entertained thousands for many years. Its humorous situations, together with its absorbing dramatic element, makes the subject certain to please both lovers of light drama and those who prefer the big heart-throb of tense, overpowering incident and episode. In the film production the laughs and thrills will be carefully balanced, so that at times it will be difficult to determine whether the subject is comedy or serious drama; until at the very last flash the culmination of the fascinating plot will bring the conviction that it is only real life after all—only life, with its smiles and sighs.

Carlyle Blackwell is an ideal type for the part of Morson, about whom most of the action revolves. In both the lighter moments and the big dramatic situations, he is expected to portray a perfect characterization.

"MICHAEL STROGOFF" (Popular Plays and Players).

The first production of the newly organized feature producers, Popular Plays and Players' Company, of which Harry J. Cohen is general manager, will be "Michael Strogoff" with the eminent dramatic actor, Jacob P. Adler, in the role of the courier to the Czar. The initial production of this company promises many novel surprises, one of which will be the introduction of the ten Tartar soldiers now located at the Russian Embassy, Washington, who are being used in several of the scenes and which necessitates their being brought from Washington to the Lubin plant at Philadelphia several times a week.

"Michael Strogoff," with Mr. Adler in his original role, will be produced by the Lubin Manufacturing Company with the best of Lubin's stars in support of Mr. Adler and all the Lubin facilities brought to bear to make this the first of the Popular Plays and Players' one of the strongest features of the year. Two hundred players are used throughout most of the production, all of whom are drafted from the Lubin companies, Mr. Adler alone being a stranger to the big Philadelphia studios. June 1 is the date of the first release.

LAMB'S TOUR IN PICTURES.

The Lambs, the greatest actors' club in the world, are taking a moving picture of all the important happenings connected with their present tour, which includes the principal cities of the country, starting yesterday and ending next Saturday.

Before starting on their whirlwind trip, many interesting scenes were taken during rehearsals, and on Friday the parade down Broadway, New York, with all the principal stars of this country, headed by John Philip Sousa's Band, was taken.

The busy, clicking camera will accompany the Lambs on their entire trip, faithfully recording all their antics in the parades, to be held in each of the cities in the itinerary, and also catching many unique and interesting scenes in the performance.

When completed, this film will constitute a valuable acquisition to the archives of this famous club, and it can be truthfully said that never before has such an array of talent been assembled in any one picture.

The Lambs have appointed as sole distributors of the film, Sawyer, Inc., through whom it will be marketed.

AN INTERESTING CATALOGUE.

The new and very interesting illustrated and descriptive catalogues recently issued by The Automatic Ticket Selling and Cash Register Company has just been received. This catalogue not only contains a great deal of information concerning the machine in question, but has also a great deal of information of value to owners of moving picture houses, who are progressive and up-to-date and desire to have every modern convenience which will enable them to handle their business expeditiously, safely and under the best possible business system.

"THE TRAP-DOOR CLUE" (Kleine-Celio).

Another exciting detective story, replete with ingeniously devised situations and abounding in sensation, is offered in George Kleine's swiftly-moving, two-reel subject, "The Trap-door Clue," made by the Celio Company, of Rome, and soon to be shown for the first time in America. This subject will be released through the General Film Company, June 9th.

Scene from "The Trap-Door Clue" (Kleine-Celio).

The producer of the picture selected some of the most popular players on the continent to contribute to its success, and American Celio fans will recognize the familiar faces of Olga Bennett and Albert Collins. The photography is up to the Celio standard of excellence and the settings add greatly to the artistic beauty of the film.

"THE FATAL OATH" (Great Northern Special).

In this three-part photodrama, Miss Betty Nansen is afforded another splendid opportunity to display the emotional qualities which have distinguished her presence in the preceding subjects in the series which bears her name. In the role of a countess who becomes enamored of a young actor and thereby incurs the displeasure of her husband, she compels interest from the very beginning and reaches the unlooked for climax in the final scene with all the intensity of her art. The story of the play is unusual in many respects and aims strongly at dramatic effect in the building up of its situations. During the periods in which the countess is brought to a realzation of the unworthiness of the man for whom she had renounced husband and luxury, Miss Nansen rises to the fullest possibilities of the part. The distinguished actress is given excellent support by the Great Northern players and the work of the director is to be commended for artistic settings and the excellence of the general ensemble.

Swanson, president and treasurer; Barney Rosenthal, vice-president, and Alfred Bryant, secretary. The company has offices in Kansas City and St. Louis, Mo.

"THE TRAIL OF THE LONESOME PINE" (Broadway).

The Broadway Picture Producing Company, 236 Knickerbocker Theater Building, New York City, has received flattering reports from the first thousand feet of "The Trail of the Lonesome Pine."

No expense has been spared to make the photoplay of the well known name as successful as the book, play and song.

Miss Dixie Compton as "June" in "The Trail of the Lonesome Pine" (Broadway).

Several startling situations have been worked out. The part of June is in the hands of the well known star, Miss Dixie Compton, who is a Kentuckian, and fits the part like a glove. Her hosemanship stands her in good need, as she has several dashes through the mountains which no ordinary rider could handle.

Mrs. Stuart Robson has the comedy part of Old Hon, and it is needless to say what she will make of one of these lovable old Kentucky women. Mr. Richard Allen plays Jack Hale. Frank Dear is directing and playing Dave. He is picturesque in a thankless part. The picture will be released about June 15.

BIG KLEINE FEATURES TO COME.

In an interview, given out at his Chicago office recently, George Kleine told of the big plans under way for the early release of nine big multiple-reel features. Some now ready and others receiving their finishing touches preparatory for release this summer are mentioned as follows:

"Julius Caesar"—An eight-reel film by Societa Italiana "Cines." Staged by Signor E. Guazzoni, whose wonderful work is familiar to all in "Quo Vadis?" and "Antony and Cleopatra."

To "Julius Caesar," Guazzoni brings the best of his principals, including the incomparable Anthony Novelli in the role of Caesar. Ready about June 15th.

"The Lion of Venice"—In six parts. A fifteenth century drama, made in Venice, Italy, for the Photo Drama Company, which controls world's rights. The famous canals and historic palaces of Venice make delightful backgrounds. Now ready.

"Ivan, the Terrible"—In eight parts. Period about 1530. Ivan IV was the first Czar of Russia—cruel, merciless, almost barbarous. The story has never before been told in pictures. Not yet ready.

"Spartacus, or The Revolt of the Gladiators"—In eight reels, executed by Pasquali. A mighty subject handled in a big way. Period of story about 150 B. C. Spartacus has all the charm of ancient Rome. It has no inharmonious note anywhere. Now ready.

"Othello, or The Moor of Venice"—In five reels. Made in Venice, Italy, in the only fitting environment for the divine Shakespearian drama. Now ready.

"The History of Pierrot"—In four reels, with descriptive music. Made by the Celio Company, and featuring Miss Francesca Bertini, already well known to American picture enthusiasts. Miss Bertini handles the title role of this most unusual subject with great ability. An allegorical story, very quaint and new to Americans. Some of the most beautiful settings I have ever seen. The photography is flawless. Ready about June 15th.

"Salammbo"—In eight reels. From the world-famous novel of that name, by Gustave Flaubert. Period about 250 years B. C. A tale of ancient Carthage. Not yet ready.

"The Naked Truth"—In five parts. Made by Societa Italiana "Cines," and featuring the famous European star, Lyda Borelli. Essentially, it is a story of a woman's great love, and her disillusionment. Miss Borelli's work is fascinating. Ready about June 15th.

"Du Barry"—Adapted from David Belasco's play, featuring Mrs. Leslie Carter in the role of Madam Du Barry. Date of first presentation to be announced later.

THE TRUNK MYSTERY (Lubin).

This is one of the most excruciating comedies ever released by the Lubin Company. To the principal of the story it is very dramatic and far from a laugh, but it is a case of a club jag which in the morning upsets all memories of the night before, and murder and the electric chair loom up in fearful vision.

Dunn Brown will stay out half of the nights at the club, and his family are perturbed. One night the family are packing up to go to the country, Smith, who is courting Brown's sister, is there, assisting, but Brown is as usual at the club, soused. Smith goes to bring him home, and not being able to find the right overcoat, supplies a very flashy one belonging to a member. On the way home, Brown meets a tramp, who is about to be arrested for sleeping in a coal yard. He takes the tramp home and both go to sleep on the parlor floor. Next morning the newspapers issue big headlines of a murder which is supposed to have been committed in a coal yard by a man in a flashy overcoat. Brown sees the tramp upon the floor, and being unable to wake him, thinks that the man is dead. He also sees the flashy overcoat, and not being able to remember the events of last night, concludes that he, Brown, must be the murderer. He rolls the still sleeping tramp into one of the traveling trunks. As the family are taking breakfast the tramp escapes and is arrested. Smith has always constituted himself as a wonderful amateur detective, and appearing upon the scene, suspects Brown. The club member comes to claim his overcoat; Smith has him arrested, also the chambermaid of the house. He then tracks Brown and the trunk, and takes them to the city station house, there it is found that the whole mater is a hoax perpetrated by a cub reporter. The prisoners are released, and Smith gets a good licking for his detective work, which was a failure. The comedy was written by Clay M. Greene, staged by Joseph Smiley, and played by a very excellent cast.

WHITMAN FEATURE ANNOUNCEMENT.

The Whitman Features Company announces that it will release a strong three-part feature entitled "His Flesh and Blood" through the Garrison Film Company of New York. The story is based on the recent "gang" troubles in New York City. Another production scheduled for release is entitled "The Toll of Love," a three-part production written by John William Kellette, who has recently been engaged as scenario editor for the company. The production is under the direction of Martin Faust, formerly with the Lubin Co.

BIG PICTURE FROM ALBUQUERQUE COMPANY.

IN the production of "The Lust of the Red Man," a mammoth piece of motion picture art now being staged by G. P. Hamilton, president and general manager of the Albuquerque Film Manufacturing Co., Inc., there is a wonderful amount of detail and attention paid to the realism and the production will no doubt be a startling picture from all the points of motion picture criticism. The scenario is from the pen of Miss Dot Farley, whose name as a writer of motion picture stories needs no introduction. It was she who wrote the "Peril of the Plains," the first three-reel picture produced in America at the time it was staged. Miss Farley also plays the lead in "The Lust of the Red Man," as she did in the "Peril of the Plains."

Miss Dot Farley.

One thing that is evident with the Albuquerque Film Mfg. Co., Inc., and that is that they do not spare talent of expense in making their productions the best on the market. Under the direction of Mr. Hamilton, Buck Connors is superintendent of the massive Indian-Military story. His experience as a Texas ranger fighting along the border, where he went recently to secure pictures for the company and his two years' duty as a civilian scout under the late Major A. W. Butt, President's Aide de Camp, whose heroism while the Titanic was sinking will be recalled by everyone, has fitted him for such gigantic productions. He was also sub-Indian agent for Buffalo Bill's Wild West and is an authority on the Sioux. He has large troops of cavalry, Indian villages set in the true Sioux arrangement for attack. A stockade considered by artists to be the most perfect yet, was built especially for this picture and shows several houses, barracks, etc.

"OUR DAUGHTER."

A one-reel Eclair production released Sunday, May 17th, features Barbara Tennant and Oscar Lund in one of the strongest thousand-foot pictures yet released on the Universal Program. It tells a story of parental neglect and a beautiful daughter who has everything she craves for, but love.

Scene from "Our Daughter" (Eclair).

The lesson it teaches is strong and one of the scenes contains a most thrilling punch wherein a seven-passenger touring car is dashed over a high cliff, landing with its occupants in a heap of scrap-iron and debris on the rocks below.

"METAMORPHOSIS" (American).

An unusual story based on theories expounding the psychology of mind and matter. Professor Frank Burr (Sydney Ayres) writes a book, entitled, "The Spirit of Man in Bondage to His Flesh." In exploiting his theories he causes his spirit to leave the body and miraculously perform deeds at great distance. The dissolving scenes by which the feat is accomplished are convincingly presented. The dramatic action and photographic quality are superb. The story is replete with incidents, thrills and novel effects. Vivian Rich is the heroine with Jack Richardson and Harry Von Meter as rivals for her hand. Charlotte Burton has an important part in the first reel, but is early eliminated by an act of fate.

Scene from "Metamorphosis" (American).

The subject will no doubt cause considerable comment by trade and public. The American Film Manufacturing Company is successful in their determination to always present something new and original.

THEATER RECORD LEDGER.

A copy of James V. Bryson's theater record, made by the Theater Record Ledger Company, of Minneapolis, Minn., would seem to be the most practical record of business transacted that a motion picture theater manager could invest in. It was worked out by Mr. Bryson after long experience and study of the questions involved and is calculated to cover a full year's business of fifty-two weeks. The new edition of the record is just now ready for the market. Mr. Bryson reports that he is in receipt of orders from points as far distant as the Philippine Islands and has many testimonials to the excellence of his ledger. Get a line on it.

RAW FILM SUPPLY CO. HAS GOODWIN LICENSE.

Elsewhere in the advertising pages of this issue of The Moving Picture World the Raw Film Supply Co. announces that it has been granted the right to market "Agfa" and "Gevaert" film under the Goodwin letters patent. This announcement is made to allay any feeling of uncertainty on the part of users of these brands of positive and negative film stock, as to their position since the validity of the Goodwin patent has been affirmed and the notification to the trade that the Goodwin Company's rights would be enforced. All Raw Film Supply Co.'s customers are thus fully protected.

"THE MILLION DOLLAR ROBBERY" (Solax).

Extremely melodramatic and thrilling, but so thoroughly consistent in story and legitimate in treatment, that its value as a high-class drama of unusual power is remarkable, "The Million Dollar Robbery" is a four-reel feature of unusual interest.

Two bicycle polo teams engaged in an exciting game of unique sport furnish the opening scenes of the photoplay which rapidly develops into one of the most baffling detective mysteries ever presented upon the screen.

A million dollars in securities is taken from a safe and not a clue is available whereby the thief can be discovered. The fact that a cuff link belonging to the private secretary of the man who loses the wealth is found near the scene of the robbery is seized upon by the banker, who is jealous of the secretary's attentions to his employer's beautiful daughter, to accuse the young man of the theft. The false testimony of the butler, who is paid for his villainy by the banker, fixes the crime upon the secretary and a famous detective is engaged by the girl to solve the mystery.

Scene from "The Million Dollar Mystery" (Solax).

The sudden prosperity of the butler causes him to plunge into a life of dissipation and crime that finally leads to his undoing, but the author of "The Million Dollar Robbery" is as much a mystery as ever, even after the perjury of the butler has been established. A strong surprise climax is reached when through the activity of a finger print and a hypnotist working under the master mind of the detective, the millionaire discovers that he has robbed himself.

Broadway, the Bowery, the Brooklyn Bridge and several interesting locations on Long Island furnish backgrounds for some of the most sensational scenes of the drama, which abounds in tense situations and rapid action. Claire Whitney, Vinnie Burns, Fraunie Fraunholz and James O'Neill are prominent in the cast and are supported by such well-known players as Harris Gordon, Edwin Brandt, Jack Burns, J. W. Conway, Harrish Ingraham and Frank Cooke.

"THE SONG IN THE DARK" (Essanay).

It is conceded by those who witnessed the projection of Essanay's attraction, "The Song in the Dark," booked for release Friday, June 12th, as being one of the most beautiful heart interest productions ever released by that company. The comparison of the poor, blind canary with the young society girl of wealth, is indeed human. She had purchased a bird from a vender. He had made his living and a handsome profit by selling the birds—they were beautiful singers. Some friends of the girl desired to purchase a canary or so, and she led them to the vender's home, where she discovered that he blinded them—"that they would sing better thus." Her angry passion arose and she had him arrested. During the nights that followed the canary would gaily sing, awakening it's purchaser. Then, an accident happened—she became blind herself. The vender had served his time, and, reading the news of the accident, he went to her, kneeling before the saddened girl, his heart overflowing with pathos. The story is truly interesting throughout and carries with it an air of goodness to humanity. Miss Gerda Holmes, in the role of the blind girl, plays it admirably. The other members of the cast do splendid work.

"TRAPPED BY WIRELESS" (Kleine-Eclipse).

Since Marconi's great discovery we have had a number of "wireless" plays both upon the stage and in motion pictures, but none of them has been handled in such unique fashion as George Kleine's "Trapped by Wireless," manufactured by the Eclipse Company of Paris and scheduled for release through the General Film Company, June 2. In this story, a tale of a pretty American girl captured and held for ransom by a band of Balkan mountaineers, one sensational incident follows another, combining to produce a film that may truly be called remarkable even in this day of marvelous motion picture achievement.

Among the spectacular scenes of the film is that showing the deposed outlaw chief crossing a chasm hand-over-hand on a rope which has been stretched across it, with the girl clinging to his shoulders, and the pursuit by the bandits, who cross on a narrow tree-trunk which they have thrown over after the escaping pair have cut the rope behind them.

"THE ONLY SON" (Lasky).

The next release of the Jesse L. Lasky Feature Play Company will be Winchell Smith's most recent dramatic success, "The Only Son," with the original star of the legitimate production, Thomas W. Ross in his original role.

Mr. Ross has been at Los Angeles for the past six weeks working before the camera and is now en route back to New York with the print of "The Only Son," which will be released June 15th.

Scene from "The Only Son" (Lasky).

Whereas in the stage production, the action of the piece started with the only son as a full grown man, in the photoplay production, two reels are devoted to developing the story from the time the boy's father began life as a prospective and shows the mother diligently working to care for her husband.

A strong majestic vein of sympathetic romance intertwines throughout the action of the entire five reels and this strain of sympathy has caused the Lasky Company to label the film as the story that knocks at the door of your heart.

Notes of the Trade.

THE seventh picture of the "Lucille Love, Girl of Mystery" series, in which Francis Ford and Grace Cunard are starring, will be the most expensive production staged at the Hollywood studios of the Universal Company in many months. It was necessary to use an ocean-going steamship in a stormy sea in the forthcoming picture of the series.

"Drifting Hearts" is a "Beauty" release, not only because of the excellence of the drama, but the moral trend of the story is so comprehensive and beautiful in conception that it commends itself to the most favorable consideration. The photographic quality is par excellence. Margarita Fischer and Harry Pollard play the leads.

Jay Hunt writes from Los Angeles, as follows: "I regret to inform you that an error has crept into your usually authentic columns under the caption 'Notes of the Trade,' in your May 2nd number. You state: 'Jay Hunt has been directing for the past two months. This makes three advancements in that length of time.' The fact is, however, that I connected myself with the motion picture industry in June, 1910, as a director, and have served continuously to this date in that capacity."

After two months' work, the decorations in the offices of the World Film Corporation, No. 130 West 46th Street, are complete. The entire scheme, including partitions and office furniture, is in subdued silver-gray oak finish, light brown rugs with darker borders, and indirect lighting throughout. The entrance opens up on a spacious reception room, fitted with large library tables and easy chairs. Just behind, enclosed in frosted glass, is the Statistical Department, and branching from a hallway, one side of which is frosted glass, and the other plate, are the private offices. The projection room is in Italian design of dull green and old bronze, with artistic pilasters equally spacing the wall in panels, into which are mounted antique bronze vases. Large leather chairs add an air of comfort and luxury to these most artistic surroundings.

Herbert Brenon, director of Imp features and the producer of the big seven-reel success, "Neptune's Daughter," is in Alabama, playing the part of "A Son of the Soil," on his farm, situated near Fairholt. Mr. Brenon spent months toiling with the production of "Neptune," and this, with his serious accident while in Bermuda, put him in line for a much needed rest and change.

"A Prince of Bohemia," by the American Film Mfg. Co., is a love story with a pathetic strain, yet so naturally presented with so happy a climax as to prove a delightful presentation. Wm. Garwood and Vivian Rich play opposites.

What is probably a unique record was made on the opening of the new Apollo Theater, the largest motion picture house in Peoria, Ill., last week, when it opened its doors for the first time, with George Kleine's "Antony and Cleopatra," as the initial attraction. The production played four days, and the manager reports capacity houses from morning until night. The show was run continuously from 10 A. M. until midnight.

Al. E. Christie and his Nestor comedy players are soon to produce a side-splitter which has its settings aboard a pullman car on a limited train. In order to get the necessary touches of realism, the Universal Company already has arranged with a railroad company entering Los Angeles, for a special train between that city and San Diego. All the scenes will be staged either inside the coaches or on the platform of any stations at which the train stops.

"Mein Lieber Katrina" is a slapstick comedy featuring George Field and Ida Lewis. It is the first subject of this nature attempted by the "Flying A" people, and put out with splendid success. Two other subjects will be subsequently released, completing a series of three subjects of which each is complete in itself.

Chicago is agog with talk of George Kleine's unique presentation of his eight-reel "Spartacus." An orchestra of thirty-eight, led by Morest Altschuler, who was brought from New York for the purpose, and the rental of such a beautiful and historic playhouse as the Chicago Auditorium, has caused Chicago dramatic critics to say that Kleine has introduced another innovation.

Dots and dashes of the Morse telegraphic code, sewn inside of a coat, is the new and novel means of communication between a spy and a girl who supplies him with information in "On the Verge of War," a two-reel drama just completed by Otis Turner and his Universal "Special Feature" Company. Hypnotism also is utilized in the story. Herbert Rawlinson and Anna Little play the stellar roles, while Frank Lloyd is the spy.

"Metamorphosis" is a psychological drama expounding the tenets of the doctrine of the spirit of man being held in bondage to the flesh. This is a singular, and at the same time very difficult, subject to handle. The production has given opportunity for several novel effects which are brought out very beautifully by the "Flying A" Company.

"A Shadow from the Past" is a coming Frontier drama that is considerably out of the ordinary run of stories. Dolly Larkin as Dolly, Joe Franz as Joe, and Arthur Allardt as Arthur, portray the leading roles in the play, which was written by Karl R. Coolidge, and produced by Willis L. Robards.

The following were elected to select rooms: V. H. Lawn, A. W. Atkins and George A. Prussel, while the committee on fees is J. J. Loewes, C. L. Kelben and Victor J. Lawn. This is to be a purely social club, where theatrical men may drop in to forget their labors. Many of the men mentioned above are moving picture exhibitors. The next meeting is scheduled for May 22, at Polli's Palace.

Polli's new theater at Hartford, Conn., will soon be ready for occupancy, and should have its first opening by June 1, unless delays occur at the last moment.

Manager Moxley Blumenberg, New Portland Theater, Portland, Me., gave over his house on May 13 to local talent, but the rest of the week was given over to the regular program of moving pictures and vaudeville. Mr. Blumenberg finds business very fair.

Too many friends of Fred Collie, manager of Collie's Opera House, Turner's Falls, Mass., were grieved to hear of his death, due to pneumonia.

The Somerville Theater, Davis Square, Somerville, Mass., is now nearly ready for its opening. This house is of brick, and is thoroughly fireproof and up to date in every respect. The theater was erected by the Hobbs family, well known in Somerville, and is to be called "The House of Quality." The policy will be vaudeville and photoplays, with admission prices up to 25 cents. Two shows will be given daily, at 2:30 and 7:30 p.m. The location is one of the best in Somerville, and the Somerville Theater should easily do a prosperous business. HENRY

NORTHWESTERN NEW YORK.

M. B. SCHLESINGER has resigned as manager of the Academy Theater, Buffalo, to become manager of the new Olympic Theater, which opened in that city recently. He formerly managed the Casino Theater, Chicago. The Olympic is owned by Buffalo men, including Messrs. Jacobson and Slotkin. Five acts of vaudeville and first-run moving pictures are featured. The matinee price is ten cents and the evening prices ten and twenty cents. The Olympic is on Lafayette Square and is handsomely decorated and furnished.

E. Meadows has resigned as manager of the special feature department of the General Film Company, in Buffalo. After June 1 he will be connected with the executive staff of the Colonial Motion Picture Corporation of New York City. Before taking up his new position, Mr. Meadows is enjoying a trip to the Bermudas.

The Happy Hour moving picture theater, Buffalo, managed by Harry Marsey, has been redecorated and otherwise improved. Thirty feet have been added to the length of the house and as a result the seating capacity has been considerably increased. This is now one of the finest little theaters in the State.

Joseph A. Schuchert, who recently resigned as manager of the Buffalo branch of the General Film Company, is devoting his entire time to his several moving picture theaters. Mr. Schuchert is widely known as a pioneer film man. He was the originator of the Buffalo Film Exchange, which was later taken over by the General Film Company.

James A. Bailey, treasurer of the Academy Theater, Buffalo, has been appointed assistant manager of that house. He also retains his former position.

To help attract attention to the "Quo Vadis" pictures at the Hippodrome Theater, Buffalo, Manager Wallinford recently placed a lifesize figure of a wolf in front of his house. On the figure he placed this sign: "Come in and see how Lucille Love is attacked in a Jungle and makes her escape."

Manager Harold Edel of the Strand Theater, Buffalo, used a successful plan to attract crowds to "Graves's Millions," the moving picture feature playing at his house. To advertise the show he arranged with the Marine Bank of Buffalo to furnish $25,000 in bills, which were placed in bags in front of the box office. These were heavily guarded and the idea was effective. Mr. Edel recently carried a page advertisement in the Buffalo Courier on "Million Bill." Other recent bookings included William Farnum in "The Redemption of David Carson," Charles Klein's "The Gamblers," "The Sea Wolf" and Arnold Daly in "The Port of Missing Men." George Bouchard, formerly first violinist of Theodore Thomas' orchestra, has been added to the Strand orchestra, now consisting of eleven pieces and a pipe organ.

The Grand, Colonial Amusu, Majestic, Mozart and other theaters of Elmira, N. Y., recently turned over several hundred dollars of their receipts to local charity workers, known as the Seven Allied Charities.

The Colonial Theater of Elmira has been decorated and improved in other ways. The house plays vaudeville and moving pictures and is under the same management as the Victoria Theater, Rochester.

Moving pictures showing the attack on Vera Cruz were among the recent offerings at the Lyric Theater, Buffalo. Edward L. Hyman, assistant manager, looks after the many details of the house, while Manager Marcus is giving special attention to his Symphony orchestra, which he features each Sunday.

BILLY BISON.

WASHINGTON, D. C.

THOSE of the exhibitors of Washington who have houses are now facing the annual lack of attendance, for the summer weather is now with us and the outdoors are having their attractions. Many of these have already opened but another week will see all working in good shape. At the Maycroft, 621-623 H street Northeast Fred Stein is using small pocket electric lights as an aid in seating his patrons. The staff (keep) or more ushers of this park each has a lamp. When a single person or a party enters the gate, Mr. Stein flashes the number and answering flashes from the ushers shows him just where to direct the patrons. There is no noise from the calling of the employees or the disagreeable snapping of fingers and when the rush is on it can be easily handled. This park has been renovated and on warm nights it is a very comfortable spot.

Manager Semmes has announced that it will probability Glen Echo Park will open for the season on Saturday, May 23. Arrangements have been made with the General Film Company for the service.

Those of the Washingtonians who visited Baltimore last week and attended the festivities of the league of that city are still singing its praises. All are of the opinion that a better entertainment could not have been furnished, and they say nothing in the world can beat Baltimore's hospitality. Among those who were on the Washington party were Mr. Mrs. and Miss Herbert, Mr., Mrs. and Miss Joy, Fulton Brylawski, Joe Morgan, John Payette and Mrs. Fuller.

The Gem Theater, at 1423 Seventh street, Northwest, is one of the new additions in the field here, having been opened about two weeks ago. F. Hasle and F. Mayer are the proprietors of this house, which is one of the most attractive in that section of the city. It has a seating capacity of 250 and is subdivided for the white and colored patrons. A subdued light is produced by six eccentric fixtures of the direct-indirect type, the lights being set in ornamental globes. The ceiling is ornamented in buff, green and red, in pleasing contrast. The walls are old rose in color with embossed borders in gold, beneath which the wall has been tinted buff and stenciled in design. There are two exits, one on either side of the screen, at the rear. The operator's booth is roomy and well ventilated, and the Power's Six machine is presided over by Mr. Milton Wolf. Mr. Hasle, of the firm, is an old-timer in the game and is the proprietor of several houses in Virginia. The service is furnished by the General Film Co.

In line with the present Mexican unpleasantness the pictures showing the preparedness of the American army are likely to meet with great favor, especially in this city, where are located the headquarters of the Army, Navy and Marine Corps, and the people seem to be watching for the release of such a series as has been taken by the Selig Company, which will depict all arms of the service, including setting-up exercises, drills, skirmishes, etc. The films showing the cavalry in action will prove very popular, for this branch of the army always gains applause through the daring feats of its members performed while in the saddle, but the most exciting reel will be that showing the boys in blue and khaki under fire. These pictures were taken under the direction of the War Department and will prove true to life.

The "Queries and Comments" columns appearing in one of the local daily papers under the heading of "Motion Picture News," are proving quite a feature and the readers are availing themselves of the opportunity of gaining information of all kinds concerning the business. Two of the four papers are devoting considerable space to the industry, printing short sketches of the plays as well as gossip concerning exhibitors, the players, and others interested.

H. M. Osborn has severed his connection with the General Film Co. pany, and J. Leo Yates, who formerly covered Virginia, West Virginia and North and South Carolina, will now do the work for them.

J. P. Anderson, of the Warner Feature Film company, has just returned from a four days' flying trip through the South.

The Rambler, under the management of Joseph A. Hayden, has been opened at Ninth and O streets, Northwest. This house has a seating capacity of approximately 500.

A charter has been granted by the Virginia State corporation commission at Alexandria, Va., to the Peerless Amusement Company, Inc., of that city, having a capital stock of from $2,000 to $25,000. The officers are W. A. Boyd, president, and B. F. Vernon, secretary, both of Washington, D. C.

The Favorite Theater, on H street near North Capitol street, has installed a Reiser screen and each afternoon when the home team is out of the city the house is crowded with enthusiastic baseball fans. This theater was recently remodeled and enlarged, more than one hundred additional seats being put in. The interior was redecorated and a new lighting system installed. Manager Watson has now a very attractive theater.

Tom Moore gladdened the hearts of some two hundred or more inmates of the district jail with a two-hour moving picture show. He was assisted by Fred Hinkley and G. W. Pennell. This show was followed by a vaudeville entertainment in which the prisoners themselves participated.

Samuel Greenberg, manager of the Empire Theater has made a hit with the school children of the Northwest section, and a jigger hit with the parents of said youngsters, through his donating that theater to their use recently, for the purpose of raising funds for the support of their playgrounds. He started the ball rolling by inviting the youngsters to make a grand rush for the theater where a free show was awaiting them, and as the fame of entertainment was flung the trunk of the manager. He opened the show with a film showing the raising and unfurling of the American flag, which operation so stirred the eight hundred youngsters that they all stood up while the picture of the flag remained on the screen. This was followed with views showing the scenes of Washington, Interest. And other famous men, with moving pictures showing Washington Crossing the Delaware, etc. Two weeks later he invited the parents to pay the regular admission, to see their youngsters on the screen and every mother and father who every found that they could drag along made a pilgrimage to the Empire to see Mary or Johnny running across the target spot.

Mr. M. Coleman, proprietor of the Star Theater, was the one of that name to the misfortune of the neighborhood in which he is located for the, same purpose. Cooperating with Mr. Coleman was the Warner Feature Film Company and their "Saving Beauty" and "Vitagraph's Wonderful Eyes" were shown to the youngsters. This is in a good cause and both Mr. Coleman and Mr. Greenberg are to be commended for the and they have forgiven the children.

The novelty slides manufactured by this concern are being ordered extensively by business men for advertising purposes, opening an entirely new field.

L. D. Purdy, who has been conducting the De Luxe Theater at 4908 Telegraph avenue, Oakland, Cal., for some time, has abandoned this house and opened for business near by on Telegraph avenue, near Claremont. CHURCH.

MISSOURI.

GEO J. SCHERER, assistant manager of the Navajo Film Company, of Kansas City, has resumed work after an illness of six weeks from inflammatory rheumatism.

An epidemic of scarlet fever at Polo, Mo., has forced F. B. Hendren, manager of the Electric Theater, at that place, to close down temporarily.

The Gayety Theater, of Omaha, Neb., is the latest to turn to the silent drama as a means of crowding the house during the summer months. Feature attractions, with runs of a week, will be utilized, the admission price being fixed at 25 cents. E. L. Johnson is manager of the theater.

The Kansas City Feature Film Company has opened a branch at Des Moines, Ia., the style being the Des Moines Film & Supply Company. Offices have been taken in the Utica building. R. C. LiBeau, who has spent four years with the Oklahoma City and Milwaukee branches of the General Film Company, has charge of the new branch, which will carry both films and supplies.

A suffragette parade is still novel enough to attract attention and motion picture men were plentiful in Kansas City on May 9, when the first pageant of the kind in this section was staged. J. J. Brown, Pathe Weekly representative here, took several hundred feet of pictures of the vote-seeking women, while the Holt Feature Film Company, of Manhattan, Kan., also had men on the ground. Several amateurs have invested in cameras, apparently, and practiced on the suffragettes. A special feature department has been created by the Kansas City branch of the Universal, with C. W. Potter in charge. The supply department has been enlarged and placed under the management of H. G. Gill, who has been with the Oklahoma City branch for the past year.

W. S. Roberts has opened an airdome at Council Grove, Kan.

The Orpheum Theater, a big time vaudeville house, presented motion pictures exclusively, beginning May 18. The initial attraction was a seven-reel picture of the Indian wars, said to be historically correct. The transfer of allegiance of the Orpheum for the summer emphasizes the fact that the exhibitor who is in the moving picture business during the entire year has a good many things to contend with during the hot months. Several of the vaudeville, burlesque and legitimate houses in Kansas City have changed to motion pictures recently.

J. J. Brown is the author of a new plan which shortly will be put into commission in Kansas City. Mr. Brown proposes to take motion pictures of all important local events and show them in Kansas City photoplay theaters.

J. C. Wirthman, a druggist, of Kansas City, is the projector of a new $200,000 moving picture house at Thirty-first and Troost avenue, which will seat 1,800. The buildings now occupying the site will be razed and work on the new theater begun in the near future. The structure will have a frontage of 114 feet on Troost avenue and 220 feet on Thirty-first street. A stage, 30 by 65 feet, will be a feature. Modern ventilating and lighting systems are provided by the plans, which have been completed by local architects.

A marked tendency toward higher prices is evident in Missouri and Kansas exhibitors' circles, applying to those in the smaller towns as well as in the larger cities. Exhibitors of Ottawa, Coffeyville and Pittsburg, Kan., have announced that ten cents will be the prevailing price of admission in the future. The movement is so general that many of those interested in the industry predict the passing of the five-cent theater, which would be a development of gratification to most members of the profession. In some cities photoplay theaters have charged five cents so steadfastly that to many persons a moving picture performance is synonymous with "nickel show." A general raise in admission fee would have the effect of eliminating this expression as well as allowing exhibitors to make a fair profit on their investments, it is said. Those who cling to the five-cent fee are reducing the number of films from four to three, or in some cases, two.

Edward W. Green a Kansas City exhibitor, has asked the police to assist him in recovering three films alleged to have been taken by a messenger. Mr. Green sent the young man to a local exchange for the film. The boy failed to return, according to the exhibitor.

An old Sunday closing ordinance has been revived at Pittsburg, Kan., by the W. C. T. U., members of which swore out warrants against the owners of the five motion picture theaters of that city, causing their arrest. The proprietors were released on their own recognizance and continued operating. The law providing that motion picture theaters shall close on Sundays is about four years old, and is practically a dead letter. An effort to enforce it was made about three years ago, but the jury refused to convict the first defendant tried, and the prosecutors abandoned their efforts along this line. Pittsburg is in the heart of the Kansas coal mining section and hundreds of miners depend on the silent drama for their Sunday entertainment and recreation. Labor leaders have taken a flat-footed stand in behalf of the photoplay theaters and will assist the exhibitors in repealing the law.

At a session of the upper house of the Kansas City council on May 11, a number of ordinances allowing the erection of aridomes was passed. The measure prohibiting such places of amusement is still pending in the city council. There appears to be however, only a remote chance for any action on it, as a number of other ordinances have caused its relegation.

ST. LOUIS.

THE Memorial Presbyterian Church operates a moving picture show in connection with its Sunday School, to which tickets are issued to only those children who attend Sunday School regularly.

A 1200 foot reel of St. Louis sights was shown to a few members of The Business Men's League in the director's room. Pictures were taken of downtown streets with a camera mounted on a street car trouble wagon. Spring fashions were snapped from the society parade in Forest Park, views from Art Hill showing Pageant stage, and the First Regiment National Guards in parade.

When Malcolm Williams appeared in the leading role in "The Brute," at the New Grand Central during the week ending May 16th, he was recognized as an old stage favorite by many St. Louisans. Mr. Williams formerly starred in a stock company at Pope's Theater.

C. N. Sutton, representing the Syndicate Film Corporation, has opened an office in the Mutual Exchange, where he will handle the bookings for the Thanhouser feature, "The Million Dollar Mystery."

The theater in Delmar Garden, one of the largest amusement parks in the state, which has in previous seasons run a straight dramatic bill, will show moving pictures this summer with feature films as the chief attraction.

The Columbia theater, whose regular vaudeville season closed last week is showing "The Indian Wars of the West Visualized," produced by the Buffalo Bill Historic Film Co. The attendance is so much better than the management expected that they may continue to show moving pictures indefinitely. Fifteen and twenty-five cents admission is charged.

The Emmanuel Methodist Church on McCausland Avenue gives a moving picture performance each Friday night.

The "Times Movie Review," a film of local events which is issued as a supplement to the St. Louis Times, is shown each Wednesday at the following Theaters: Grand Central, Plymouth, Arco, Monroe, Union, Park, Broadway, Best, Marguerite Clark, Shenandoah, Princess.

C. E. Maberry, manager of the New Delmar Airdome, 4936 Delmar Ave., has installed two new machines for the outdoor performance, and in case the weather is bad the pictures can be moved into the theater adjoining in less than five minutes. The program consists of six reels of pictures with an excellent orchestra.

GIEBLER.

INDIANA.

THE Murat, Indianapolis' largest and most exclusive theater is giving daily matinees in which "Les Miserables," the film that is attracting attention in the leading capitals of the world, is being featured. This moving picture film is drawing big houses here.

The Alhambra, Indianapolis, is giving Hoosiers a treat with moving pictures of Meredith Nicholson's "The Port of Missing Men." Mr. Nicholson's home is in Indianapolis, and his novel naturally is a favorite with Indiana people.

The Switow Amusement Company, of Kentucky, has announced that $75,000 of its capital stock of $300,000 is to be represented in Indiana.

South Bend, Ind., is to have a municipal public amusement board under the jurisdiction of which will be every theater, including moving picture houses, of the city. The order establishing the board is in line with recent reforms of the citizens' party administration and becomes effective at once. Mayor Keller will sit on the board. The job will carry no salary.

Motion pictures are being used at the First Baptist church, Terre Haute, Ind., to illustrate the sermons.

Rain at Linton, Ind., spoiled the attendance for Lyman H. Howe's moving pictures of the Panama Canal zone at the Alcazar. Return engagements will be booked.

W. A. Ross, manager of the Princess theater has leased the McFerren opera house in Boswell, Ind., and will produce moving pictures and vaudeville there. It is reported Ross is to form a circuit of his own in the motion picture business, he now owning several houses in and around Hoopeston, Ind.

The Airdome, Washington, Ind., has opened its summer doors with the Audley Players and moving pictures.

The Empress theater, Ft. Wayne, Ind., which offers vaudeville and motion pictures has closed a contract with the Warner people for two releases each week and an exclusive contract for McGrath's "The Million Dollar Mystery."

George J. Beihoff, district manager and special representative for the World Film Corporation, New York is in Indianapolis looking over the Indiana motion picture field. Mr. Beihoff, who is covering the entire country from New York to Seattle, is making his headquarters while in Indianapolis at the local branch of the World Film Corporation with Ed Mack, the genial Indiana manager.

In speaking of the local field Mr. Beihoff says Indiana and vicinity apparently is a hard nut to crack so far as the picture business is concerned. During the last three weeks however the World's business here has increased $2,000 worth, and many of the corporation's recent releases are booking up splendidly. Mr. Beihoff has been successful in placing several good contracts in the middle west since his advent here. Mr. Mack reports he has booked Jules Verne's "Cast Aways" with the Lyceum here for a week solid. He says this film is going fine in this territory.

Harry C. Smeltzer, former citizen of Muncie, Ind., and a member of the famous Alaska-Siberian expedition is lecturing throughout the entire seven reels of the Yosemite travel pictures now being shown in Muncie for the especial benefit of school children. The pictures will come to Indianapolis and will be shown at the English opera house.

A moving picture film censorship for South Bend, Ind., is not practicable, according to the report of Mayor Keller's investigating committee which was appointed to find out whether a municipal censor board for the city would be possible. The committee finds that some of the local picture houses may be improved in the matter of physical illumination, ventilation and temperature, cleanliness, width of aisles and location of exits. The committee finds the co-operation of schools, the public and theater owners has been generous and suggests that a permanent amusement committee be appointed instead of a censorship board.

The committee took a school census to find out the part children played in motion picture attendance. They found 279 children had never been to the shows, 291 who went "seldom," 967 visiting with adults, 1,038 boys and 997 girls who "made" the houses regularly themselves, 1286 who preferred cowboy and Indiana fighting pictures, 207 preferring comedies, 221 preferring dramatic films and 308 preferring educational. Thirteen children liked best scenes of violence and crimes.

The figures show one-third of the children like the higher class pictures. This percentage comprises the three upper grades. The committee reported further that from the best figures obtainable there are about 17,000 motion picture houses in the country with a daily attendance of from seven to ten million people; that $320,000,000 a year is spent by Americans on this indoor entertainment and that the national board of censorship passes on over 7,000 films each year. The committee estimates 10,000 South Bend children visit the local "movies."

WILLIAM.

KENTUCKY.

LOUISVILLE exhibitors have been doing a land office business during the past few days. The weather has been very fine, and the town is crowded with strangers brought here for the opening of the spring racing season. Saturday, May 9, Derby Day, found the streets jammed from early morning until late at night, and the picture houses did their full share of business all day. The fact that the regular theaters have closed for the season, and that the parks have not yet opened leaves it up to the public to patronize the theaters, and the results are surprising from the viewpoint of the man in the box office.

The Walnut Street Theater, Louisville, showed the two big Universal productions of "Sampson" and "Lucille Love" to large audiences at the local playhouse during the past week. J. Warren Kerrigan, who takes the leading part in the former production, is a very popular man in Louisville and vicinity, and anything in which he appears generally makes a big appeal to the public.

B. F. Keith's theater in Louisville has wound up its regular season of vaudeville and is now showing motion pictures at the house, although it is expected that a summer vaudeville performance will soon be started, as was done last year. The features "Indian Wars of the West" are being shown with good results. These pictures were posed for by United States soldiers and real Indians under direction of Colonel W. F. Cody, known for years as Buffalo Bill, in his Wild West productions. The story was well told in the local papers, and the public turned out strong to see the famous pictures. Two shows were held daily, one at 2:15 and the other at 8:15.

The National Theater has started its summer season and has put in effect the summer prices, ten cents for matinee performances, and ten and twenty cents for night sessions. Besides several light sketches and other vaudeville turns, two reels of Keystone comedy films were shown at the theater during the past week.

Manager R. S. Shrader, of the Central Film Service Company, Louisville, recently made a short trip to Hodgenville, where he bought up the rights of the concern operating the Opera House in that city, and will continue to operate the house for himself. He has put Harry Abney, formerly an operator at the Novelty Theater in Louisville, in charge of the house as manager. Abney has been working for the former manager of the house since leaving Louisville some three months ago. He is full of ginger, industrius and a good picture man and his many friends in Louisville are confident that he will make a go of the house for the new owner.

Clarence Bess, manager of the "Tea room" and soda fountain of the John C. Lewis Company's large department store on Fourth avenue, has taken advantage of the public's strong admiration of Mary Pickford, and is now putting up a special confection in the way of a "Sundae," which he has dubbed the "Mary Pickford Sundae." The confection sells for twenty cents and is proving immensely popular, but not in any sense of the word as popular as its "godmother."

Although Carpenter and Johnston, of Louisville, expected to take pictures of the running of the fortieth Kentucky Derby, they were unable to make satisfactory arrangements, and left the taking of the pictures to "Sweeney." However, "Sweeney" was on the job in the form of the Industrial Motion Picture Company, of Chicago, and took the pictures for Alf Oldham, who conducts the Woodland Theater in Louisville. This theater was formerly known as "Lion Garden" and is located on Preston street near Kentucky.

It is reported that Louisville men are making arrangements to open motion picture houses at Glenwood Park and Fern Grove, two summer picnic resorts located in Indiana, just across the river, a few miles from Louisville. CINCINNATI

THE Orpheum, the big theater up on Walnut Hills, is meeting with complete success in its motion picture program. It is featuring in its advertising the claim that it is "the house of features," and its programs have gone far toward justifying this name, as many big multiple reel productions have been shown to the large audiences which have been accommodated regularly in the theater. The management is preparing to open the roof show of the Orpheum which is always a feature of its summer offerings, the weather so far having been hardly such as to make outdoor performances possible. Things have warmed up now, and the breezy and elevated roof garden is certain to prove attractive to large crowds nightly.

The Mutual Film Company's Cincinnati branch, in charge of Manager C. C. Hite, has been handling excellent business all through its territory, which comprises parts of Kentucky, Ohio, Indiana and West Virginia. The offerings of the Mutual have proved highly pleasing to exhibitors and their patrons, judging from reports received at the Cincinnati office, one of the most conspicuous of recent successes being the Keystone two-reel production, "Caught at the Cabaret," which also caught the fancy of audience everywhere.

The latest thing in outdoor picture shows is the big concrete-and-steel ball park of the Cincinnati team, which is one of the largest and finest in the West. Otto Luedeking and associates are using the park nightly in the presentation of big feature productions, Vitagraph's "A Million Bid" being the first of a series of productions which are promised for the summer. Fans who occupy the seats of their brethren of the ball park at night. The enterprise, while a rather novel and venturesome one, seems to be meeting with success, judging from the number of persons in the audiences; and as long as this is the case, it is probable that the use of Redland Field for this purpose will be kept up all summer. The arrangement is one which could undoubtedly be duplicated with profit in almost every city which has a baseball team.

The Family, under the management of I. Lipson, is meeting with success in the series being run by Edison, in which the adventures of Miss Dolly Desmond, the girl reporter-detective, are featured. Mr. Lipson stating recently that audiences seem to like the plan by which each installment is a story in itself, requiring no knowledge of previous productions to give an understanding of the plot.

"Les Miserables," the Eclectic production of Hugo's masterpiece, completed its second and last week at the Grand Opera House last week with marked success. Daily matinees, with two evening performances a day, were given, and the management states that all were well attended, during the entire run of the production.

M. Lynch has opened a new house at Liberty and Central avenues, in Cincinnati with a seating capacity of one thousand persons. The house is a handsome one, and starts with every indication of success. Mr. Lynch formerly owned and operated the Gem, near the busy spot in Walnut Hills known as Peebles Corner. The Gem is now handled by Wm. Munsey, who is making a success of it, as did Mr. Lynch.

Ed. Bernardi, manager of the Colonial and the Avenue, and his partner, T. A. Reilly, are building a large airdome in Bellevue, Ky., immediately across the Ohio river from Cincinnati, which will seat about two thousand persons. It will be known as the National, and will run features exclusively.

The Cincinnati "booster" excursion, which covered a large territory in southern Ohio and eastern Indiana last week, used motion pictures depicting the industrial activity of the Queen City with telling effect on the trip. Several thousand feet of film were used for this purpose, and the business men of the numerous towns visited viewed them with much interest.

A number of Cincinnati exhibitors expressed themselves recently as heartily indorsing the sentiments of the letter to the National Board of Censorship, of New York, a member of the National Board of Censorship, to the effect that Federal censorship of motion picture films is unnecessary, the National Board giving all of the censorship necessary. The local men go further, and assert emphatically that State censorship is equally unnecessary, and even more burdensome, as it subjects exhibitors to the risk of having their films rendered worthless in this state or that, and, on the other hand, threatens to deprive the exhibitors of good pictures without just cause. "You can bet on it that anything that gets by the National Board is all right, from every standpoint," declared a prominent manager in Cincinnati recently. "On the other hand, the State censors in Ohio have, to my personal knowledge, already cut out a number of perfectly unobjectionable pictures, and what they will do when they get to going I hate to think."

Friends of M. A. Neff, of Cincinnati, president of the Motion Picture Exhibitors' League of America, are much gratified at the recent action of the New York branch of the organization, taken at its semi-annual meeting at Rochester, in indorsing Mr. Neff for re-election as head of the national body. The New Yorkers will send a large delegation to the national convention to be held at Dayton, Ohio, in July, and it now seems that with the support of this and other influential branches Mr. Neff's re-election is assured.

The management of the Royal Theater, of Dayton, Ohio, recently gave a substantial "boost" to the cause of the Newsboys' Protective Association of the Dayton Herald, when it gave the youngsters every cent derived from admissions on May 8, reducing the price to five cents for that day only. The boys sold tickets all over the city, and as the program was up to the Royal's usual high standard, indicated by its usual admission price of ten cents, a nice sum resulted.

The Jefferson, of Hamilton, Ohio, ran the second installment of "The Perils of Pauline" last week, large audiences attesting the interest felt in this latest of the leading serials. The popularity of Pearl White and Crane Wilbur in the leading roles in the "Pauline" series makes it certain that it will continue to draw well, especially in view of the large amount of publicity being given to it, and the management of the Jefferson is so far well pleased with the way it has taken.

The Peerless Feature Film & Supply Co. has been incorporated at Toledo, Ohio, by Bud Munzenhenner, G. Munzeshenner, Samuel Kohn, Ferd. Munzehenner and F. Kilcheimer, with a capital stock of $10,000. The company will handle a full line of supplies, and has arranged to furnish feature service, including a number of releases of high merit.

Much interest has been manifested among the local moving picture supply men of this city in just what the outcome will be of the convention that was held recently in the Witherspoon building by the National Organization of Sunday School teachers. At the meeting plans were discussed with approval for the use of moving pictures in the Sunday schools. Five years ago it is safe to say that a plan of this sort would have met with a very different reception. Today it is a known fact that moving picture plays of a better kind have taken on a dignity; they have invaded the field of secular education, even of science, and their direct appeal to the children is a factor that cannot be neglected in any consideration of their possibilities.

A $20,000 moving picture house is to replace the Star Theater at 410 Market street, under plans that the Peter Masaro Amusement Company is having prepared. Work on the new building will be begun about June 1.

Preliminary plans have been arranged for the construction of a moving picture theater for the Montgomery Amusement Company, at 31st and Wilt streets. The building will be a one-story terra-cotta brick, 55 by 128 feet, and will have a seating capacity of 1,000. Some time this month, the Miles Theater, of Detroit, will discontinue its policy of running a two-hour picture show, from 12:30 to 2:30 p. m., preceding the regular vaudeville show. Manager Porter contends that on account of the warm weather there is not a large enough patronage at the noon hour to justify the expense of keeping the house open, but that the same policy will be resumed in the late summer or early fall when the weather gets cool again.

Motion picture exhibitors of Grand Rapids are preparing to organize for purposes of mutual protection and co-operation in matters of common interest. Connolly, of Detroit, has ruled that Detroit theatrical managers may post advertising matter on any private barricades, such as are erected around buildings in process of construction, etc., providing they get permission from the owners. The judge contended the barricares were erected to protect the life of citizens and were public property. He dismissed the case.

The Governor of Michigan, the Hon. Woodbridge N. Ferris, attended his first picture show on May 12 in Lansing. While he did not express any great enthusiasm, he said he could readily understand why it was that many people became "fiends" of the moving picture.

SMITH.

ILLINOIS.

THE city council of Paxton has adopted the censorship ordinance which once before failed of passage, according to a dispatch from that place. The ideas of the Chicago board of censors will guide to some extent because the measure provides that no pictures can be shown in Paxton which have not been passed by the Chicago board or by the license committee and mayor of Paxton. The license committee and the mayor have the power to revoke all theater permits.

Illinois editors are now making plain their attitude toward the censorship plan. The Illinois State Journal at Springfield sees the matter from the view of the exhibitor and producer and exchange and calls any scheme for local regulation "obnoxious" and impracticable. It favors either national or state censorship. Plea for local censorship is made at Bloomington by the Pantagraph which urges the mayor and council to make provision for the work in the next fiscal year.

FLAIMING that the existing Ohio film censorship law was "railroaded" through without giving the people of the film manufacturing trade an opportunity for a hearing and that it was not requested by the public, the Cleveland Photoplay Exhibitors' Board of Trade is circulating a petition asking the legislature to repeal the act. A blank is being mailed to every motion picture exhibitor in the state, asking his opinion on the censorship and his estimate of the films, as to their morality. Sam Bullock is chairman of the committee conducting the investigation. The circular states the operation of the Ohio law amounts to "legalized graft." It is pointed out that the law required the censorship of all films and imposes a charge of one dollar per reel. It also calls attention to the exhibiting of more than 20,000 reels of film to 17,000,000 patrons of 1,000 family theaters, during the period the censors were restrained by law from reviewing the films, without a single complaint.

MONTREAL

THE New Grand has changed its policy from moving pictures to that of "legitimate" stock.

It is impossible to build a moving picture theater in Montreal at the present time, for the building inspector will grant no permits until the city council's new by-law comes into force, and this cannot take place for at least a month. The by-law is now in the hands of the law department. The by-law was introduced in the old city council, but was over with recent civic elections. It calls for drastic changes in the photoplay houses. Scenery, movable or stationary, is not permitted, while a clause has been inserted to insure the entrances not being choked with posters and lobby displays. A space at least fifteen feet wide and seven feet high must be left in all entrances, while provision for more exits is made. Theaters with an area of up to 1,800 square feet must have three exits, while those up to 3,600 square feet must have four exits, as well as the entrances.

In the brief period of twenty-two weeks he has been placed in charge of no fewer than three houses in different cities, with satisfactory results from a financial standpoint. Confidential Advice to Exhibitors

It is our purpose in our advertising announcements to try to state as nearly as possible the exact truth regarding all Majestic releases, and we hope exhibitors may learn to rely on these statements. We try to have all our pictures good pictures and to give you always a dependable program, but in the very nature of things not all releases can be "world-beaters" or "knock-outs." There must be a difference—some pictures better than others. We owe it to the exhibitors and the public to tell just what these differences are. Hence the following:

Majestic Guide for Exhibitors

THE DOUBLE KNOT, two reels, for Sunday, May 24—a strong, thrilling drama.

THE SONG OF THE SHORE, one reel, for Tuesday, May 26—Nothing exceptional. Just a fair picture, featuring Courtenay Foote.

THE STOLEN RADIUM, one reel, for Friday, May 29. Rather a novel detective story but nothing extraordinary.

THE SOUL OF HONOR, two reels, for Sunday, May 31. For our opinion of this picture see announcement above.

THE NEWER WOMAN, one reel for Tuesday, June 2—a delightfully amusing comedy drama presenting Dorothy Gish and Robert Harron.

Simplex

$300 on and after June 1st, 1914

When the Simplex machine was placed on the market over three years ago, its list price was fixed at $275. Since then, from time to time, expensive additions have been made which have greatly improved it.

When Simplex first entered into competition with the then established makes of machines, the trade recognized that it set a higher standard in design, materials and workmanship than had ever been known before in motion picture machine construction.

Simplex Quality is responsible for our present large business necessitating 25,100 sq. ft. of floor space and 250 men to make enough machines to fill our orders.

Simplex Quality is responsible for the wonderful reputation and demand achieved by the machine in North and South America, Europe and the Orient.

Simplex Quality has forced improvements in other makes of machines which suffered much by comparison.

THE SHEEP RUNNERS (June 2).—Jim Woods, a tractable old sheep runner, dwells with his daughter, Beth, in a mountain cabin and does his best to keep his wandering flocks from infringing upon the meadows claimed by the cattlemen. Dave Rivers, himself a black sheep, pretends friendship for Woods on account of his daughter and vainly tries to make an impression upon her. One day there comes to Woods' humble home Morris Brayton, a young man from the Middle West, who is in search of health, and soon finds that and something else—for Beth Woods is a true tonic.

One day in the little village a trio of cattlemen in a "thirst parlor," while protesting friendship for Woods, frame up a scheme to oust him from the neighborhood, and enlist Rivers in their nefarious enterprise. Brayton overhears this plot and pleads with old man Woods to leave the matter in his hands. He discovers Rivers as the active malefactor driving Woods' sheep down the mountains over into the territory of the cattlemen and remonstrates with him. This results in a desperate fight—the men grappling and struggling on the edge of a precipice until they at length go over, clasped in each other's arms. Happily, Rivers is at the bottom of things and Brayton's life is spared. Old Woods and his daughter next morning searching for their flocks, find Brayton. The girl immediately shows her father the man of her choice by her joy in finding him alive, and they seal their betrothal with a kiss in the presence of the old man. This forms a spirited chapter of real life in the great West.

THE RUMMAGE SALE (June 3).—Septimus Snow, a quaint, old-fashioned man, lives a secluded life and earns a precarious living by copying manuscripts. While he is poor, he is, nevertheless, a gentleman, the modern fashions have passed him untouched, while the courtly manners of long ago are reflected by him. Septimus conceives a great desire to possess a dress-suit. As his means are most modest, he is at his wits' end to secure the society garb. Finally he sees the object of his quest at a rummage sale. While he hesitates over it, Rose, one of the society girls, writes on the reverse side of the price tag: "The buyer of this dress-suit acquires entree to the best society in town." Delighted at the prospect of regaining his social prestige, Septimus buys the suit.

Aunt Salina, with whom mischievous Rose lives, is a wealthy maiden lady of uncertain age. Septimus receives a bid to a reception, and decides that would be the time to test the potency of his newly acquired clothes. He rigs himself out "fit to kill" and makes his appearance at the function, and after embarrassing experiences with the flunkies is discovered by Rose, who bespeaks the respect of those present for her guest. Conscious of having committed some modern social error so frightens Septimus that he flies for refuge upstairs and unwittingly seeks to retreat in the boudoir of Aunt Salina. This haughty maiden lady, curiously enough, takes a decided liking to the intruder, and the result is that she marries Septimus. Mischievous Rose, who sold him the suit at the rummage sale, also comes into appreciation of Uncle Septimus' finer qualities as a man superior to his clothes.

WILLIE'S HAIRCUT (June 4).—Johnnie Brown is ordered, much against his will, to the barber to have a close hair-cut. Accompanying him is also a note asking the barber to have his father's razor honed. On the way Johnnie meets Willie Green, the adored child of a temperamental mother, who is compelled to wear long golden curls and clothes of a cut that are ridiculed by the rough youths of the neighborhood. The artful Johnnie persuades Willie to take the razor and the note, which requests the close hair-cut, to the barber for him. The result is that Willie, despite his tearfests, is shorn of his beautiful locks. When he returns home his mother goes into hysterics over the spectacle of her darling boy, but Willie has such a new-born sense of manliness that he hurriedly soothes her, and rushes off to play ball with the other fellows—a new boy. Willie Green's father, on coming home and learning the truth of the situation, slyly rewards Johnnie Brown for his share in accomplishing the manly transformation.

HIS FIRST RIDE (June 4).—A tramp, evidently weary of walking, discovers a messenger boy's bicycle, and takes possession of it. He then starts around the town and runs amuck with various people, accomplishing hilarious results with more varieties of funny falls than one usually experiences in a pair of slap-stick comedies.

ROSE O' MY HEART (June 6).—Accused by George Armstrong, a fellow clerk in a bank, John Marston is unjustly condemned to a long imprisonment. He is forced to leave his young wife and little baby girl, to whom he has given the pet name of Rose o' My Heart. After the prison doors close upon him, Fate favors Armstrong, who is advanced to the presidency of the bank.

Finally released, Marston comes back a gray and broken man, to seek out his wife and child. The latter has developed into a beautiful young woman, who has the love and admiration of Horace Manly, a locksmith, but she feels she cannot give herself to him in marriage while the stain rests upon her father's name. When the latter returns from prison, Manly generously prevails upon him to become his partner, he, himself, being skilled in lock and safe-making. One day the First National Bank experiences some difficulty with its huge safe, and Marston is sent to rectify matters. He is asked into Armstrong's private office, and finds him standing alone before the open door of the big vault. Human nature is human, and he begins to scourge the guilty man in spite of himself. Armstrong, fearing violence, runs into the safe, closes the door, which locks, leaving the astonished Marston outside. He immediately gives the alarm, but the stupid policeman at first believes that Marston was trying to rob the safe. When he explains the situation, his partner, Manly, is also sent for. Both lend their efforts, and through their combined skill Armstrong is liberated, but in an unconscious condition. This brings on an affection of the heart from which he succumbs, but not before he confesses that he was guilty of the crime for which Marston had suffered. The rest of Marston's life is made happy and his beloved child, Rose o' My Heart, blooms as the wife of his honest partner, Manly.

JUDGE DUNN'S DECISION (Special—Two Parts—June 8).—Judge Dunn, in addition to commanding respect of the bar, has a social standing of the high order in the great city where he presides as a magistrate. He is a busy man—very much occupied with the duties of his position, so that his family largely take upon themselves the social obligations, are active factors in the dispensing of hospitality, and are always in the functions at the current call of society. Mrs. Dunn is a popular matron and her young lady daughter, Kate, follows in her footsteps as a frivolous society woman. They spend large sums on the latest and most daring clothes, and the mother is addicted strongly to the game of Bridge. She becomes a confirmed gambler, and both mother and daughter are a constant attendants at card parties. Judge Dunn is so fully occupied with the cares of office, that he does not understand these things.

The chief factor of order in the Dunn mansion, is a clever and attractive second-maid, Anna Gregory, who supports her poor, old mother through her own efforts. She, constantly in association with all the feminine finery that her mistress and the daughter flaunt day and night, has a great longing to possess the things she cannot afford. While she lives in an atmosphere of extravagance, her own modest wages are frequently backward, and finally quite an accumulation is due her. Her poor mother must pay the rent for the humble home, and beseeches her daughter to bring the matter urgently before her mistress. As Mrs. Dunn spends her income up to the last cent for frivolous things, she is at her wits end to raise ready cash, even for such a needy case like this; but she loads the girl with gowns and fine feathers in lieu of real money. Of course, the poor girl appearing in this finery, excites suspicion in her own set, and it even attracts the attention of Judge Dunn. She leaves the secluded situation and secures a position in a department store where she, so well dressed and obliging, that she proves an unusually attractive employee—consequently courting criticism from her associates, and praise from her employer.

In the interim, things are going from bad to worse with Mrs. Dunn in her extravagant ways of living, and her make-shifts to get ready money. Finally, she is so hard pressed to pay gambling debts, that she purloins her husband's diamond studs from the safe in the bed-room and pawns them. Then comes a night when the Judge must needs appear in full dress. He goes for his studs and finds them gone. Mrs. Dunn in terror throws suspicion upon Anna, her late maid.

The insinuation cast out by Mrs. Dunn takes immediate root in the suspicious mind of the police, and Anna is arrested and confined in jail to await trial. The fact of her fine dresses has confirmed unpleasant rumor concerning the poor girl; so she has no calls in prison from her late associates. Her poor mother alone is left alone to bear the burden and the ignominy. In the interim, Judge Dunn gradually awakens to the fact that all is not well in his own home. This is intensified by the bitter cry of Anna's por mother, who visits the Judge in Chambers, and tells him before he condemns her own daughter that he had better watch his own family, whose actions have not been above reproach. While the magistrate swallows his wrath, his suspicions are involuntarily quickened.

Gambling debts are again pressing Mrs. Dunn. One evening the Judge returns home unduly early and happens to observe his wife make a draft upon the family safe. He hurriedly opens the safe after she closes it, and confirms the fact of the purloining and follows his wife to the pawn-brokers. She is hardly out of the pawn-shop before he is in and through his authority as a minion of the law secures the copy of her receipt and description of the goods. The next day poor Anna comes before the Judge in court. He dismisses her case; but orders her mother and herself to meet him in chambers and immediately 'phones to his own home, calling his wife and daughter.

In the meantime detectives have produced another unwilling party in the form of a fast young man, who has been waiting on the Judge's daughter, Kate, and had at the same time attempted the downfall of Anna. This interesting quintette are summoned to the Judge's room, each ignorant of the coming of the other. Primarily, the Judge administers a severe castigation to the hard-faced young snob, who preys upon women and whose sense of decency is only confined to clothing himself in the latest fashion. Kate sees the falsity of her friendship and Anna is congratulated on her escape from such a whelp. The stern man of the law does not flinch then and there from upbraiding his own women folk and shows how their frivolity and extravagance came near ruining the life of a virtuous, hard-working girl. These evil idlers are forced to acknowledge their fault and apologize to poor Anna and her mother. Presumably the Dunn family's reformation begins at home, while Anna and her mother bravely begin life anew with an unstained name.

THE ADVENTURES OF KATHLYN—No. 13 (The Court of Death) (Special—Two Parts—June 15).—Kathlyn and her party, having escaped a dreadful death from the rain of fiery lava, and the great rocks that fly and darken the air with the eruption from a volcano, observe its subsidence with profound gratitude. They have had so many miraculous escapes that this finale, a seismic disturbance—which is the crowning one—has singular value in a sensational way, in proving a visual motographic triumph. They remain in the shelter of the cliff until the eruption ceases, and then escaping the burning streams of lava, move resolutely on to find the treasure trove. Unfortunately, Kathlyn has lost the idol, which necessitates a hunt requiring valuable time. However, they finally come into the cave, and learn from the native who was badly wounded by Umballah, that they have arrived too late, as that arch villan has decamped with the treasure. The dangers that infest the island, the fruitlessness of their search, inspire them to get away from the place of death and destruction as quickly as possible. On the seashore Kathlyn sweeps the horizon with her powerful binoculars, and sees Umballah's boat almost hull down in the dim distance. He has a great advantage in start, but they take up the chase unfalteringly.

When Umballah reaches his native heath, his first precaution is to rush to the chief boatman's hut, where he hopes to temporarily cache his gold; but this he finds occupied by the great servitor of Bruce and Kathlyn in saving the lives of himself and his child, refuses to aid the intruder. Umballah is instantly furious, knocks the man down and hurries away to a nearby jungle, which happens to be the lair of leopards. He is unaware of this, but before he has time to hide his gold, the leopards return and Umballah with his followers fly for their lives, leaving the treasure. Kathlyn and her party, having landed and been informed of the situation by the faithful boatman, invade the jungle, find the deserted gold, which they place in the panniers on their mounts and take to their own camp.

Umballah and his natives presently regain courage, and returning to bury their gold, find it has been taken. He immediately surmises that Kathlyn and Bruce are of the neighborhood and instructs the natives to search the village for firearms and appealing to race hatred, to "take back the gold from the white devils who had robbed him." The natives secure rifles and ammunition and surprise the camp of Kathlyn and her party. Umballah, at the point of his rifle, forces Kathly and her father to mount horses and commands the natives to take Bruce and the others to the boatman's hut and hold them prisoners. Bruce and Ramabai, a little later escape from the natives, return to the camp where the gold has been hidden, unearth it and proceed to Allaha to give it up to the Supreme Tribunal.

Umballah, with devilish malignity, manages to get his prisoners incarcerated in the Court of Death, with the purpose of torturing them, and then feeding Kathlyn to the lions. In the interim Bruce and his companions have reached the court of the Supreme Tribunal and proffered the dignitaries the great treasure they have found, but they refuse to accept the gold until Kathlyn has been found. This stirs Bruce to unusual activity. He impresses a number of soldiers outside the Royal Guard, and starts an extensive search. They bring to him a slave who is crawling painfully on the earth, having been bastinadoed by Umballah until his feet are cut to pieces. He informs them where Kathlyn and her father are detained just about the time Umballah has arranged to free the lions in the arena. Ramabai climbs upon the balcony of the Court of Death, and has there a spirited personal enounter with Umballah, who finally disarms him and drags him into his private chamber.

Bruce hurries around to the enclosure, having rescued Kathlyn, who implores him to save Ramabai. He enters the house just in time to save that worthy from being stabbed by one of Umballah's slaves. The master villain, Umballah, is finally captured and turned in bonds to the treadmill, where he is destined to work out his days. Kathlyn gives the gold to the poor and is freed forever from the throne by the Supreme Tribunal. A week later, accompanied by her father, her sister and the faithful Bruce, they reach the coast and set sail for their beloved California, where Kathlyn's marriage to Bruce is assured. Thus culminates this singular series of adventures, that have proved an "open sesame" to a new interest for the world in moving pictures. (The End.)

EDISON.

MOTHER AND WIFE (May 30).—George Steele had made all the money he possessed by his own efforts, and was proud of it. He was a plain man, and the son of plain people. The idea that anyone should be ashamed of him or any of his family had never for a moment occurred to him. When, by a stroke of luck, one of George's inventions began to pay him tremendous royalties, he was enabled to fulfill his dearest wish by marrying Marion Ashmead. When Marion discovered that George's mother smoked a pipe, she was greatly disgusted. Accustomed, as she was, to surroundings of delicacy and refinement, the plain, substantial crudities of the Steele home came to her as a distinct shock. So distasteful did it all seem that she began at once to beg George to buy a house more fitted to their new position in life.

George readily complied with her wish. A couple of months later, they were safely installed in the new house. Old Mrs. Steele did not care for the change. The associations of the old home meant more to her than George could possibly have realized. Marion would not let her smoke her pipe in the new house, and in addition the young wife continually made the poor old woman feel that she was distinctly unwelcome. At last old Mrs. Steele crept quietly away one night, and went back to the old home. George's discoverey of his mother's action led to a dramatic scene with Marion, which ended in George leaving his wife alone in the new house, and going home to his mother.

After George left, Frank Reynolds, a life-long friend of Marion's, became very attractive to her. Under his influence, Marion gradually drifted back into the careless gay life of society. One night, luring supper at a large dance, she lighted a cigarette. As she did so, a sudden remembrance flashed upon her of the cruel words with which she had reproached George's mother for smoking her pipe. After the dance, Reynolds kissed her. Filled with remorse, Marion returned home. As she reviewed her conduct of the past few weeks, a wave of homesickness and regret swept over her. Putting on her things, she hurried over to the old house. George was reading to his mother beside the fire. Sobbing, Marion flung herself into the kind old arms.

"Mother," she cried, "I have come home!"

CONSCIENTIOUS CAROLINE (June 1).—Caroline was one of those people who have so much character that they only fit company for angels. She had an idea that it was an eminently practicable and beautiful scheme to guide one's life by a fixed system of rules and regulations. She was somewhat calmy in the crumpet about rules and regulations. Whenever she found a new motto, she stuck to it like a leech. So when she found a tasteful placard with the inscription "Do good, no matter who is hurt," she promptly bought it and hung it in her room. Shortly afterward, Caroline accepted a position with the firm of Schnitzel and Perigord, jewelers. At the time Caroline entered their employ, the two partners were engaged in a hot discussion regarding the merits of a tiara they had lately bought. Caroline straightened out the quarrel in her helpful way by informing the partners that the only way to be happy was to be good.

But a few days later, the quarrel broke out afresh. A certain count desired to buy the tiara. Perigord was in favor of taking the tiara to the count immediately, but the cautious Schnitzel restrained him, on the ground that they had no proof of the count's financial responsibility. The result was a terrific argument, which Caroline again succeeded in stilling. The partners finally agreed to go to his hotel and interview the count. The count gave immediate proof of his solvency, and Perigord was dispatched back to the store to get the tiara. Meanwhile, Caroline had been tormented with a fear that she had left the door of the safe open. True to her principles, she started back to town to correct her fancied neglect. At the store, she found Perigord engaged in opening the safe. Instantly jumping at the conclusion that he was trying to rob his partner, she had him arrested. Schnitzel waited at the hotel until the angry count informed him that he would not buy the tiara on any condition. The next morning, after Schnitzel had procured the release of the infuriated Perigord, the two partners advised Caroline to seek employment in a church. She was entirely too good for them.

WITH HIS HANDS (Fifth Story of "The Man Who Disappeared"—June 2).—Through the help of Jennie, the girl he had saved from the hands of the gangsters, John Perriton was enabled to get a position as a riveter's helper in the construction company in which Jennie herself was employed. So Perriton, still under his alias of "John Pottle" entered upon new duties, which were as strenuous as they were unfamiliar. Sortly after Perriton's arrival at the works, a good deal of trouble was caused by the unwarrantable discharge of several of the employees. Recognizing John's intellectual superiority, the men chose him as a spokesman to express their grievances to their employers.

Carter, the head of the works, was a hard unjust man with no regard whatever for the rights of the men working under him. When John courteously told him of the men's grievances, he cursed him roundly, and ordered him back to work. Realizing the power a man of John's type would gain among the men, Carter called a private detective, named Brownson, and ordered him to discover some pretext on which John might be discharged. He dared not discharge the man without any reason, because he knew that it would take very little in the existing state of discontent to precipitate a general strike. Brownson's scheme to ruin John Pottle was very simple. He took a piece of dynamite and put it in John's lunch basket. Then he complained to the police inspector that he suspected John of a plot to blow up part of the works.

But Jennie, owing to her position in the company's office, had learned of the plot and managed to extract the stick of rynamite from the lunch basket. When John was seized and searched, no incriminating evidence of any sort was found upon him. Jennie told him of the plot, and John set out post-haste to interview Brownson. He found him on the top girder of the great buildings the company was constructing. Brownson attacked him with a hammer, and a fierce hand-to-hand conflict followed. Brownson was the stronger man, and gradually forced John over the edge. At last John lost his last finger-hold and fell. Brownson lost his balance and fell after him. Luckily enough, John was saved from Brownson's fate by striking another girder. After he had been taken to the hospital, Jennie sent for Mary Wales, the girl for whose sake John had given up everything in life. But when Mary came to the hospital and saw Jennie bending tenderly above John, she did not understand, and went away without a word.

BY PARCEL POST (June 3).—When old Scraggs told Jimmy's mother that he would positively foreclose the mortgage on her home unless it was settled in full by the following Friday, the poor woman was in considerable distress. She was practically without money, and did not have the least idea in the world what she was going to do with either Jimmy or herself. As she sat in anxious bewilderment, an article in the newspaper caught her eye. It was to the effect that the parcel post service was now prepared to take packages of any sort or description weighing 100 pounds or less. His mother weighed Jimmy, bought the requisite stamps with her last few coins, and mailed Jimmy to an aunt who lived some distance.

The postman was at first somewhat reluctant to accept so unusual a parcel, but a perusal of the new rules convinced him that Jimmy met all the requirements perfectly.

After a long ride in the mail car, Jimmy and a sack of mail were dumped off at the proper station. Here he was received by Mike Casey, a kindly old Irishman, who informed him that he would have to stay with the other mail in the baggage room until the morning delivery. Then, promising to bring him some supper in a short time, Casey departed.

"Take a Tip from Father"

MR. EXHIBITOR:—

Many of you start in the M. P. business without any experience and hire the cheapest operator you can get. This is a mistake, and the longer you live the more you will regret it. The operator is the man behind the gun. Would you expect our big naval fleet to make good if you put inexperienced, underpaid operators behind guns costing thousands of dollars? No! You know you wouldn't. Why in the world should you then expect a perfect picture on your screen with an underpaid, inexperienced operator? Pay a good operator what he wants and give him a "HALLBERG" A. C. to D. C. Economizer, and one or two new M. P. machines of the latest type, such as you may want, and believe me you will drive your competitor out of business and double your profits. Never try to put over something which you know is not right; you will only fool yourself. My success is due to the high quality of the machinery and equipment which I deal in, and also to the experience which I have had, and, believe me, I never invest in anything cheap. It costs many times more in the long run. TAKE A TIP FROM FATHER.

I take old machines in trade as part pay ment for new ones, and I also make libera allowance on your old rheostats, A. C. Econ omizers, A. C. to D. C. Converters and Rectifiers in trade for the celebrated "HALLBERG" A. C. to D. C. Economizers, which give the BEST LIGHT with the LEAST CURRENT.

SOLAX-FORT LEE-NEW JERSEY

A little while after he had gone, Ed. Stoneman, a yeggman, broke into the station with the felonious intent of robbing the mail bags. Jimmy, who had found an old revolver, immediately rushed to the defense. The yeggman fled, with Jimmy in hot pursuit. Thanks to Jimmy's vocal efforts, enough men were around to seize the thief. Then it was discovered that a large reward had been offered for the apprehension of the captured man, which naturally fell to Jimmy. With it in his possession, Jimmy hurried home, arriving just in time to pay Scraggs, and save house and goods for his grateful mother, and himself.

WHEN THE MEN LEFT TOWN (Special—Two parts—June 5).—When Honoria Dawley was elected mayoress of the town, new and startling things immediately began to happen. The hand that rocked the cradle placed firmly on the help made the poor old ship of state go through a series of stunts which were in many ways remarkable. The men were the chief sufferers from the new order of things. Honoria and her peers had peculiar ideas about liquor, tobacco and all the small masculine vices. The fact that their wives and daughters were running things seemed highly amusing to the men until they discovered that they could neither smoke, drink nor gamble under any circumstances whatever. Rob the lioness of her cubs, the eagle of her mate, and you will but separate not man from his pipe and his bottle! After two days of the new regime, the indignant males of the town assembled and decided to teach the women a lesson. After dark that night, they stole from their homes and fled to a place of refuge, fifty miles distant. When day dawned, there was not a man in the place.

After the first gasp of surprise, the women decided that they were in possession of a splendid opportunity to show the men exactly how useless and unnecessary they really were. They would prove that masculine help was absolutely unnecessary in the management of a large municipality, and in a few days the crestfallen men would come slinking home. Like many another golden dream, this beautiful idea suffered when it was subjected to the actual proof. The women discovered that tidying up a whole town was subtly different from dusting the parlor and tying velvet bows on the what-not. It was not quite so easy to handle large ash cans as it might seem from the point of view of the casual onlooker. Then again, all such intricate affairs as the trolley line had to be abandoned completely. Nobody dared to monkey with the dingusses that make the car go. Finally the exasperated feelings of the forsaken wives and sweethearts were given expression in a monster parade of protest. They could not reach the men by telegraph because nobody could work the key, but a means was at last discovered in some pigeons Tom Carson had sent to his sweetheart. A wild scene took place when the men finally returned.

THE COUNTERFEITERS (June 6).—When Carl Herrmann, Joe Slavak, and Hiram Osborne found that the alloy they were using for making counterfeit money was not satisfactory, they were, to be somewhat colloquial, rather up against it. None of them had enough technical knowledge of the subject to be able to suggest a remedy. After a heated and fruitless discussion, they decided that the only thing to do was to consult an expert. Since the nature of their business forbade their taking the problem to an assayer through any legitimate channels, they hit upon a clever plan. When Paul Richards, a young assayer out of work, happened upon an advertisement in the morning paper, offering a position in a well-knowm smelting corporation to a trained assayer, he hastened to the address given. To his surprise, the officials of the smelting company knew nothing whatsoever about the advertisement. As the disappointed young man was leaving the building, however, he was met by an affable stranger, who, after a few casual remarks, informed Paul that he himself was in need of a trained assayer. Paul gratefully followed the heaven-sent stranger, who, as it happened, was none other than the versatile Mr. Carl Herrmann.

When they arrived at the counterfeiters' place of business, Paul was taken directly to the work shop, and locked in it. A note thrust under the door informed him briefly and briskly that there he was and there he should stay until he found some way of improving the alloy. Thanks to an oxy-acetylene torch, and the help of Herrmann's stepdaughter, however, Paul did not stay quite as long as the counterfeiters fondly hoped. He burned through the bars of his window, slid down a rope and went for the police. After he had brought several husky guardians of the peace into the room via the aforesaid rope, Paul pushed the following note under the door: "Come in. I have exactly what you need."

When the triumphant counterfeiters entered, they met with the surprise of their lives.

ESSANAY.

AN ANGEL UNAWARE (June 2).—Mrs. Dixon had an ungovernable temper which finally brought about a separation between her and her husband. She moved to other parts, taking her child with her. In the years that passed, he longed for the companionship of his wife and finally seeks pleasure in the company of one of the factory girls. BEANS (June 3).—Mary, a farmer's daughter, is noted for the delicious beans she takes. When her father engages a cook, Mary is terribly hurt and leaves her home for the city, where she finds employment as a cook in a restaurant. The old saying "The best way to a man's heart is through his stomach," proves true, and she soon has a host of admirers. Many funny incidents occur through these admirers trying to make love to the pretty country cook. Her father and sweetheart go to the city in search of her. They find her in a restaurant cooking beans for the patrons. They induce her to return home, where her sweetheart tells her that she can cook beans for him the rest of her life.

SOPHIE PULLS A GOOD ONE (June 4).—Miss Sophie Clutts graduates from the Dental Correspondence School and decides to start out for herself—to hang a shingle in some neighboring town and make her living by pulling both the teeth and the legs of the community. She is idly dreaming in the stage that is carrying her to Snakeville, when she is suddenly awakened by the command "Hands up!" and a burly outlaw steps up to her relieving the female dentist of a few fillings in the way of chocolate creams. Sophie finally arrives in town, purchases an outfit, rents a dental parlor, hangs out her shingle and waits for business. Several of the Beau Brummels about the post office had taken a slant at Sophie as she entered her office and were taking great pains that they should see her. The pains were greater when they left the office, however, and they swore that it was painful to know her. Sophie finally captures the outlaw, whose suffering from a troublesome tooth on accout of the candy he had appropriated from Sophie, necessitated his calling on her. Sophie is given the reward money and hatsily leaves town for other parts, much to the bewilderment and relief of the Snakeville inhabitants.

BRONCHO BILLY'S DUTY (June 6).—Broncho Billy, a doctor and minister in the far West, is overwhelmed with grief one evening when he returns to his home to find a note from his wife stating that she could not bear the lonliness any longer and had gone to town with the man she loved. A few years later she is forced to her bed where she finally dies of a broken heart. Broncho had been told of her condition and hastens to her in time to kiss and forgive her. The negligent husband returns and Broncho Billy forgetting himself, is about to slay the man, when he suddenly remembers the note his wife had left for him, with these words, "Never forget your duty to your God."

THE ELDER BROTHER (Special—2 parts—June 5).—Irving Caldwell had never known want. When his father died a great part of the estate went to the spoiled lad. When he became of age he was too good to work and spent most of his time with questionable company in and about the great white lights.

His dissipation brought him into contact with a man named Leider and the two enjoyed the reputation "The City's greatest sports." Phillip, Irving's brother, had taken what money was left him and took up the study of medicine. He graduated with high honors—opened an office and knuckled down to work. Irving became very much infatuated with a cabaret dancer. She was a good girl but cared only for the pretty things Irving would occasionally give to her. Leider was fast becoming a rival of Irving and one night the two quarreled, as both were determined to escort her home. During the argument the dancer stole out through a side door. An intoxicated man knocked her down, injuring her ankle. Phillip, who happened to be passing in his machine assists her to her home. He is greatly impressed with the girl's beauty and personality and as Fate will have it, he falls a victim to the love god. When Irving returns home in the wee small hours of the morning, he finds philip seated in a huge fireside chair deeply thinking. Irving tells him of his infatuation—that he is madly in love with a cabaret dancer. Phillip is horrified. Several days later Irving insists that Phillip accompany him to the cafe to see the girl he worships. The elder brother finally consents to go. His pulse quickens and his heart beats as if it would break when he discovers that the girl he has learned to love is the cabaret dancer that Phillip had spoken to him of. She leaves the stage, dances through the aisles among the jolly throng, stands before the bewildered Phillip—whispers to him that he must see her—but he is disgusted. He brushes her aside and leaves the cafe.

The dancer is now madly in love with Phillip, and after he had spurned her, she determines to injure him in some way, if possible. Love is something that should not be trifled with and he had trifled with her love. He should pay. She decides upon a plan of leading Irving, Phillip's brother, astray. She allows Irving to believe that she loves him, but at the same time she is conspiring with Leider, who is jealous of her, as to how she can harm him. Leider has always pretended to be his friend, and, when the opportunity presents itself, he gives Irving a box of "dope!" cigarettes. The deadly cigarettes grip the unsuspecting Irving. Phillip notices that there is something decidely wrong with Irving and is positive that the dancer is at the bottom of it. That evening he calls at the cafe and invites her into a private dining room, where he pleads that she let his brother alone. Leider informs Irving that his brother is alone with the dancer. The infuriated brother rushes into the room with the water bottle and is about to strike him down when the dancer interferes. The excitement is too much for Irving and he collapses. His brother takes him to his home and puts him to bed. Phillip then examines Irving's cigarette case, takes one of the cigarettes, cuts it open and discovers that it contains cocaine. The dancer had followed Phillip to his home and she pleads with him to allow her to remain at Irving's bedside. Leider no longer able to withstand the strain on his conscience, rushes into the sick room where he finds the dancer with the two brothers. He confesses his wrong-doing, completely exonerates the innocent girl and pleads jealousy. The following morning Irving is greatly improved and swears never to smoke again. The story ends pleasantly with Phillip holding Ruth tenderly in his arms—she having promised to become his wife.

THE JOKING BRICKLAYERS (June 1).—You know the well-dressed butting the man of superior air who offers suggestions to hard working mechanics, telling them what he thinks they should do. Usually the workmen listen good-naturedly but when Mr. Hurlburt, fashionably dressed from his patent leather shoes to his silk hat, essayed the role of general advisor to a force of bricklayers, they objected.

From their perch on the first story scaffold the workmen are in an ideal position to object. Mr. Hurlburt never suspected. When the mechanics said "three" Mr. Hurlburt found himself beneath a shower of bricks and mortar. When he could breathe he shouted for the police. They came on the run and what happened is history.

DOGS OF WAR (June 2).—The newest thing in the way of assistance to the army in time of war is the use of dogs as messengers. The Airedale terrier has been found to be the best adapted to this peculiar service and hundreds of these dogs have been trained and sent out with the Swedish army. The recent Swedish Military manoeuvers gave an opportunity to the world to see these canine soldiers in actual service and the moving picture record of the conflict will be found absorbingly interesting and unusually exciting.

Lieut. Frejman with a squad of scouts is ordered to secure what information he can concerning the movements of the enemy. A war dog called "Tell" is assigned to the squad as emergency messenger and Lieut. Frejman starts into the war zone. The scouting squad trails a temporary telephone line from the field headquarters to a point of vantage from which the enemy is sighted. Lieut. Frejman opens communication with his commanding officer at headquarters. He reports the enemy sacking a nearby town and—but the phone connection is severed suddenly. The invaders have included the temporary telephone line of the defenders in their destruction of all sources of communication.

Instantly Lieut. Frejman realizes what has happened. He scribbles his report to hearquarters, fastens it to "Tell's" collar and away goes "Tell" The commanding officer writes his further instructions to Lieut. Frejman. But when "Tell" returns he finds his master seriously wounded. Back he trots. He is discovered by the enemy and pursued. But with remarkable intelligence he eludes his foes, arriving safely in camp with Frejman's dying message. The General despatches a hospital squad to Frejman's relief and "Tell" leads them to the spot. And in times of peace "Tell" is the pet of the man whose life he saved. A search is at once made and what little hope had been cherished is dissipated when the child's helmet is found by the river's edge. Meanwhile the circus leaving town that night passes through a woods on the outskirts of town and the circus man and his wife find the sleeping child. They take him with them and decide to adopt him.

Count Covani seeks the assistance of his brother who makes every endeavor to find the child but in vain. As time goes on and no word is heard of the boy, the now sorrowful and hopeless father makes his will. He leaves all his money and property to his brother, with the proviso that if no word of the lost son and heir is had before the 21st birthday of the boy the will is to remain unchanged. Sixteen years later Harold, now a sturdy athlete and famous equestrian, is happy with his foster parents and in love with his foster sister. He is a big feature in the circus performance. Through chance a newspaper item, telling of the loss of Count Covani's son some years before is brought to the attention of the old showman and the particular point of identification, the medal found on the child, assumes great importance. Just what the old circus man would have done is hastened by his meeting with an accident. He discloses to Harold the circumstances of his adoption, the little suit and the medal and is anxious to assist Harold gain his inheritance.

Meanwhile, Harold's Uncle Charles is living in the palatial home of his brother, now dead sixteen years, but ever comes the haunting thought that the rightful heir will return. His fears are justified, for shortly before Harold's 21st birthday, Harold comes to the home of his early childhood and asserts his claim. Charles ridicules the young man's story, stating that the old circus man must be delirious. Harold returns again to the circus for more proof. Thinking to delay Harold's return until the time shall have expired by the terms of the will, his Uncle Charles endeavors to impede the boy's return with proof. Then follows a series of exciting moments. A fire on the train, a narrow escape from death and other obstacles do not prevent the arrival of Harold the second time at his former home where in an interview with his uncle's lawyer, he convinces him of the truth of his claim.

Despite the despicable methods of his Uncle Charles, Harold, of a forgiving nature, retains his uncle as manager of his big estate, gives him part of his fortune, and then goes to the old circus folks who had been his early benefactors and returns with the girl of his choice and is happily married, bringing joy and comfort to his foster parents' declining years.

ON THE VERGE OF WAR (Three Parts—June 6).—Pedro Villard is advised by his brother, Jose, that the base of American operations on the West Coast must be ascertained at once and at any cost. Pedro's operations do not fully develop until he learns that Lieutenant Freeman, U. S. N. has been detailed to make those tracing plans. While racking his brain for a method to secure these tracings, Villard drops into a theater. There he sees Professor Polari, a hypnotist, accomplish remarkable results along the line of the occult, using for his subject, a young woman whom he advertises as his daughter.

Immediately, Villard enlists the services of the hypnotist. The young woman is placed in a trance and sent to Freeman's home in answer to an ad calling for a secretress. She is employed, her movements in the house are controlled from a distance by Polari. Under his directions, she steals the tracings. The theft is almost immediately discovered and to cover her act the girl sews the papers up in the lining of an opera cloak Mrs. Freeman intends to wear at the charity ball.

Controlling the girl at a distance has been a great strain upon the hypnotist. At his side the spy is breathlessly awaiting for information. By means of telepathic waves the hypnotist reads the girl's thought. "At the Charity Ball, Mrs. Freeman —" the hypnotist can go no further. He collapses and dies. In the meantime Lieut. Freeman discovers the papers. In place of the genuine, he inserts a couple of blank papers in the coat. Villard locates the decoy papers in the cloak. His accomplices are captured, but he escapes after a thrilling chase, to his country where he meets death for failing in his mission. The girl, now free, is taken under the care of Freeman and his mother; and there is a suggestion of romance to come between the young people.

METAMORPHOSIS (Two parts—June 1).—The eccentric professor, Burr, believes that the soul of man is tied to his body by fear alone, and that, if absolute courage is found, the spirit will be able to free itself. Gray, a young society man, stimulates belief and sympathy for the old man, in order to gain his assistance in winning the love of Rose, his daughter, but Rose, unknown to either, has fallen in love with a young gangster, Arthur, whose home is not far from Burr's house, a relic of the past that stands in the slum. Gray, pursuing the policy that he hopes will win Rose, entertains society that Burr may lecture on his theories, and these are favorably received by the society folk.

In the meantime, through fate, Arthur and his gang come to loot the second floor of the house while all are interested in the lecture downstairs and Rose here discovers them. Arthur recognizes her and saves her through fighting and routing the two gangsters that have entered with him. When Burr and Gray rush in, Rose turns to her father: "Here is courage, father." But the courage of Arthur is physical and he quails before the look of disapprobation in the eyes of the old man. Following this, Burr engages in a vain search for courage and then, despairing of mankind, he embraces an opportunity to join a scientific expedition sailing for the unknown South Seas, although Rose bitterly protests and does not want to leave Arthur. Finally, however, when she has to choose between the gangster and her father, she decides that it is her duty to go with her parents. On the day of sailing, Arthur follows them to the wharf, and here Gray foolishly irritates the quick tempered Arthur and would have been struck down but for the quick motion of a discarded sweetheart of Arthur's, who takes the stab. Arthur is placed in prison. Burr and Rose settle on a South Sea isle.

Time passes. Hearing no word from Burr or Rose, Gray plans to search for them. On the isle Burr sees that Rose is gradually fading away, unhappy without her lover. After a while he tells her: "I'm too old for thy companion, daughter. I'll bring thee thy lover." Weakening his body through fasting, he deliberates his spirit, and this spirit returns to the United States, liberates Arthur from prison, influences him to embark upon the ship that carries Gray in his search for the professor and Rose, and there prevents Gray and Arthur from recognizing each other. In the chart room the spirit unseen, with its influence unfelt yet directs the course of the ship to the isle, and then returns to the body. Rising, Burr tells Rose that he leaves her, but that her lover comes to take his place. He then falls back dead as the spirit again leaves the body. As Arthur and Gray arrive the spirit performs its last mission. Arthur's gangster impulses are conquered and the good in him brought to the surface. Gray, planning to force Rose to yield to him, is led aside under the spirit's influence. The spirit of Gray is conquered and the body of Gray, dominated by the spirit of Burr, carries Rose and Arthur back to civilization and happiness.

A PRINCE OF BOHEMIA (June 3).—Tom Manning, a struggling New York sculptor ever ready to divide his last dollar with artist friend, has a woman model, who dies of consumption while posing, and begs Tom to adopt her little child. Tom's financial condition makes this additional responsibility almost impossible, but the sweet affection which the child instantly bestows upon him so wins his heart and endears herself to Tom that he feels repaid for the sacrifice. The little girl forms an extreme attachment for Manning and proudly calls him her papa to everyone, much to Tom's pride.

Tom has a sweetheart that he left in San Francisco five years before. She, being anxious to see Tom again, begs her father to take her along on a business trip, which he is taking to New York. Dorothy wires Tom of her proposed visit and he and his adopted little girl make great preparations for her arrival. Dorothy in New York surprises Tom with a visit to his studio, but finds him called out by an artist friend. She finds the little girl in the studio and she innocently assures Dorothy that she is Tom Manning's little girl. Dorothy, thinking that Tom has been false to her, leaves and refuses to listen to any explanation from Manning, who returns to the studio just as Dorothy is leaving.

Dorothy returns to her father and the old gentleman determines to demand an explanation from Manning, and they return to the studio in no very good humor. Carew, an artist friend, surmising the situation from seeing Dorothy leaving Tom's studio in grief, intercepts Dorothy and her father and explains the relationship of the little girl, who calls Tom papa. Tom, after Dorothy's departure sat in self-dejection before his fireplace with his little girl on his lap and they fall asleep. Dorothy, entirely reconciled and apologetic for her hasty conclusion, steals into his studio and finds the sculptor and the little girl asleep and awakens Tom with a kiss of forgiveness.

MEIN LIEBER KATRINA (June 5).—Heine, the proprietor of a small restaurant, proposes to Katrina, his buxom head waitress, and is promptly accepted. After the wedding, the situation is reversed and Katrina becomes the "proprietor," while Heine is forced to wait on the tables. Katrina nags at Heine incessantly and one day gets him so nervous that he unfortunately spills some soup on the village constable. Katrina pleads frantically with the constable not to arrest Heine, but the constable is furious and marches Heine off to the lock-up. Safe in his cell, Heine stretches out comfortably on his cot, murmering "Home aindt nuddings like dis," and is soon peacefully dozing. Katrina is determined to free Heine and strikes upon an ingenious plan. Soon after, she appears at the jail and delivers a pie to the constable for Heine's dinner. The constable decides to eat the pie himself and discovers a large file inside. He arrests Katrina for "attempting to aid in a prisoner's escape," and locks her up in the same cell with Heine. Heine objects strenuously to Katrina for a cell-mate, and manages to escape through the window. Katrina attempts to follow Heine, but is too large to squeeze through the window and is forced to remain in jail, much to Heine's delight. Heine returns to the restaurant and resumes his position as boss of the cash register. He is running things with a high hand, when the constable appears angrily on the scene to rearrest him. Heine finally placates the constable with a large sum of money from the cash register and sends Katrina the following note, sandwiched between two slices of bread:

"Mein Lieber Katrina—Ven you gedt oudt in six monds, you can come pack to vork as a vaitress.—Heine."

Katrina is nearly prostrated and rages about furiously. She quickly recovers, however, and produces from her hosiery a wad of bills. She purchases freedom and returns to the restaurant. Needless to say, Heine once more becomes a "waitress" while Katrina resumes her position as "boss" of the cash register.

His valet tells her that he has left town, and didn't leave any word where he would be. Walking home, May faints, and is picked up by a young girl who is studying music in Paris, by the name of Grace, who is rich, and takes May to her home (May's), and cares for her. Upon their arrival to the house, they find that May's mother has died. Grace takes May to her own home and cares for her. She also cares for May's little baby, and loves it as though it were her own sister. May becomes very ill, and is taken to a home in the South for consumptives.

While Grace is at a concert one day, she meets Jack, the artist. They are attracted to each other, and this attraction rapidly ripens into love. Jack comes to see Grace at her home, and wants to know about the little boy that she cares for. Grace tells him that he is the little boy of a poor friend of hers. Jack wants to marry Grace, and wants her to give up the child to its mother when they get married. This Grace refuses to do and vows that she will take care of the little fellow all her life. While they were thus discussing, the maid comes in with a telegram, which reads: "May much worse, better come at once." Grace asks Jack to accompany her. They take the child with them. Upon arriving at the hospital, Jack discovers that May is his model, and the little fellow his own child. Grace finds this out and becomes

THE WONDERFUL MUSIC AT THE VITAGRAPH THEATRE

IS PLAYED EXCLUSIVELY BY

THE

REG U S PAT OFF

Unit Orchestra

For days the Vitagraph Company of America pondered and discussed pro and con the proposition of music for their colossal new venture—the VITAGRAPH THEATRE; such music as would not only fulfill their requirements, but fit in with their big and lavish ideas of decoration and policy. They had money to engage the largest and finest orchestra in America; their sole idea being to get the BEST music, and the music that they unanimously decided upon to be the BEST was produced by the magnificent WURLITZER UNIT ORCHESTRA, which is admitted to be an equal attraction with their splendid pictures.

Wm. A. Brady writes: "I feel certain that your new instrument will shortly be used in all theatres in place of the usual orchestra."

Such a prophecy is rapidly becoming a reality; other Wurlitzer Orchestras having already been installed in Proctor's and Cort's, New York; the Baptist Temple in Philadelphia; Cort's in Chicago; the Paris in Denver, Colo.; the Imperial in Montreal; the million-dollar Elks Temple in New York, and many others.

Wurlitzer Motion Picture Musical Instruments sell for as low as $900, and every one is a positive boomer of business.

ALGY'S ALIBI (May 24).—Algy was ready to go home to a waiting wife and dinner when Jack and Jim pounced upon him and insisted he go to a smoker. Algy knew his wife wouldn't want him to, but over the phone, after a promises to be home early, May consented. Algy behaved all right at the smoker until the Steplight Sisters started to sing. He objected. He insisted that he'd rather see them dance, and to let the show go on, they danced. When their number ended, Algy started to talk on temperance. Then the crowds objected. Hats and shoes were hurled at Algy, who went to the floor upon the dressing room of these awaiting their turn. In a free-for-all fight that followed Algy, escaping through the wings, got into the dressing-room.

Meanwhile May waited. And while she waited she got angry. Algy got tired and fell asleep. He woke up to find himself alone. His first thought was of May and home. He went there, but his heart failed him and he went to his office. May wrote notes to Jack and Jim, asking if Algy slept with them all night. Having lost Algy they didn't know, but each took a chance and wrote back that he did. Then May got wise that something was wrong. At Algy's office Jack and Jim and Algy confided with each other over the mixup in answers. Algy fixed up an alibi. Burglars had entered the office on a late return and tied him up. He had his pals do it for him, and when they had finished May came in. She left him tied up for the day, after dismissing the clerks for a day's holiday.

THE LEGEND OF THE SNOW CHILD (May 29).—A wealthy retired farmer and his wife deeply regret that they have no child to cheer them in their old age. They are attracted by the sounds of happy children playing in the snow outside and go to the window to watch them. The children are building a snow man and the old farmer proposes to his wife that they too shall go out in the snow and build a snow child.

They select a spot in the front yard and build a child out of snow. The neighbors think they have gone crazy, but the man and his wife continue their childish amusement until they have finished a beautiful snow child. They then return to the house and resuming their former places in front of the fire fall asleep and dream that their snow-child has come to life.

The snow child fades away and a real live child is there in place of it. It dances about for joy and dances its way into the house. The farmer and his wife awake to find their their dream come true. They are astonished and amazed, and cannot believe that it is a real live child. The child tells them that she is the daughter of the North Wind that her name is Snow White. The farmer and his wife falls on their knees and give thanks to God for sending them such a beautiful child.

Snow White cheers and comforts them until Spring comes. As the winter fades away she gets weaker and weaker. One day the children come for her to go out in the woods and look for the first spring flowers. Arrived at the woods the children build a large fire. One of the little girls finds the first flower of spring and the children dance around the fire in celebration. Snow White stands at one side disconsolate, though urged to join the fun by the other children. At last the children tiring of their dancer wander off in search of other flowers. The fire has a wonderful attraction for Snow White. Gradually and reluctantly she approaches it and is transformed from a living child back into a snow child, which rapidly melts before the intense heat of the fire until it is nothing but a shapeless mass of snow.

RELIANCE

OUR MUTUAL GIRL (No. 20—June 1).—Margaret, the niece of Mrs. Knickerbocker, was nowhere to be found. The papers were full of it. Her aunt knew only that she had gone to the East Side to search for Ada Taylor, and when she received an anonymous note asking her to meet the writer at Fourteenth street and Broadway if she would have information of her niece, she suspected kidnaping and blackmail.

"Fat" Taylor, Ada's brother, came to the house again on the evening of Margaret's disappearance, demanding news of his sister. Mrs. Knickerbocker questioned him sharply in regard to "Our Mutual Girl," but neither could help the other. Telling herself that it was a wise move to enlist Taylor in her service if possible, Mrs. Knickerbocker gave him money to finance a search for Margaret, and then further fortified her position by hiring detectives to watch her new confederate.

Meanwhile a gang of thugs on the East Side, determining to profit by the announcements they had seen in the papers, had plotted to use Ada as a means of extorting blackmail. They forced her to take a note to Mrs. Knickerbocker's door, and when the butler attempted to question her, the gangsters fell upon him, and tearing the girl away, speeded off with her in an automobile. It happened at the time that Mrs. Knickerbocker was in consultation with the detectives in the library. Hearing the butler's cries, they rushed out and entering the touring car which the detectives had left just around the corner of the house, gave chase the length of Manhattan. At South Ferry the gangsters swarmed onto a boat that was just leaving the slip. Chartering a launch, Mrs. Knickerbocker and the detectives followed. But the thugs, holding up a roll of bills bribed a tug to come alongside, and jumping aboard, made their escape.

That same day, a society burglar, who went by the name of Raffles sent his butler from the richly appointed uptown apartment down to the gangsters' den, with a message.

"Lay off this job, boys, it's mine," he wrote. And with him in the game, together with the East Side crooks, things looked black indeed for "Our Mutual Girl" and her protegee.

THE ROSE BUSH OF MEMORIES (Two Parts—June 6).—The old gardener's pride was his rose garden, and one bush in particular, growing in the heart of the sweet-scented enclosure, he cared for as though it were a child. When Ogilvie and his sweetheart Eleanor fell into the way of coming every evening to visit the garden, the old man would watch them with loving eyes as they wandered through the dewy fragrance, and when they paused at the door of his little house to wish him good-night he had always ready a pearly long-stemmed rose, fresh plucked from that most precious plant of all.

On their marriage day, the old gardener gave them the rose bush. He transplanted it with his own hands. It was set in front of the bride's cottage, and Ogilvie and Eleanor slipped a ring, which had long been a keepsake between them, onto a branch and let the new twigs imprison it there. But dark days came. The young husband and wife quarreled, and separated. With sorrowful heart, their old friend, dreaming to see alien hands touch his gift, spaded up the rose bush and took it home to his own garden. Meanwhile, Ogilvie and Eleanor are trying to forget each other in travelling. She wearies first and returning near her old home, takes a small house. Scarcely six months later, in a real estate office one day, the old gardener sees Ogilvie asking about a quiet place where he can write and farm a little. He manoeuvers to have the dealer take Ogilvie to Eleanor's cottage.

Meanwhile the gardener hurries home, happily intent on bringing the two together. He digs up the rose bush, and under cover of the darkness, that evening plants it in front of Eleanor's house. The following morning, when Ogilvie arrives to see the place, he catches his coat on a thorn and in extricating himself, notices in the heart of the bush a little band of gold. Full of wonder, he lifts his eyes, to see, standing before him, Eleanor, his wife. The next moment their hands are clasped above the fragrant blossoms—and the eyes of the old gardener, standing just behind them, unobserved, are suddenly dim with happy tears.

FOR THE SAKE OF KATE (Two Parts—May 23).—Tom Jennings is in love with Cherry, a dance hall girl, and intends marrying her against his father's (Sheriff Jennings') wishes. Angry at his father's refusal, Tom leaves home. After wandering about the country he falls in love with a notorious outlaw, though he does not know who the latter is, and while together the outlaw leaves Tom one night in camp, rides to the home town of Tom's father and robs the postoffice, then returns to the camp boasting of his crime, etc.

When the robbery is discovered, Sheriff Jennings sends young Arizona Dick, a suitor for his daughter Kate, after the robbers and promises his daughter's hand if he catches him. Dick goes, catches up with the outlaw and Tom and captures Tom, the outlaw escaping. Tom protests his innocence, but goes with Dick, not knowing where he is being taken. The sheriff is away, but Kate is home and of course recognizes her brother.

Her appeals cause Dick to let Tom escape and Dick is thrown in jail himself for allowing him to get away. Tom escapes and Dick is released by Kate and follows Tom, and finding him secures a description of his companion of the night before, and also the information that the outlaw had framed up another hold-up that night. Dick goes there with the intention of capturing him, but allows him to go after extracting a written confession that Tom was not with him in the postoffice robbery. With this vindication of the boy, Dick and Tom go home to the sheriff, who is overjoyed at his son's return, etc. Dick and Kate, of course, marry, as do Cherry and Tom.

IZZY THE OPERATOR (May 20).—Izzy Hupp is appointed night operator at the little western town of Tropico. Being a stranger in the town he causes much amusement to the natives by his size and dress. While looking over the little town he renders a service to Miss Myrtle Ferns, the belle of Tropico, and incurs the enmity of Bud Kelton, a western loafer, who thinks to frighten Izzy by bluffing him. Izzy gives Bud a good thrashing. Bud makes Myrtle believe Izzy a coward. Izzy hunts for Bud to prove the coward part. Bud and Red Roger plan to disgrace Izzy by robbing the little station, but Izzy blinds them by throwing tobacco in their eyes and thus saving the property, besides winning Myrtle as his assistant for life.

MORNING TELEGRAPH:

Seldom, if ever, has a play been more artistically shown or more thoroughly appreciated. The scenes aroused the audience to "Ohs!" and "Ahs!" The acting was of the highest order. The theatre was packed and it looked more like the presentation of an important opera than the opening of a feature film.

WONDERFUL says the

A rare film with the most beautiful scenes ever shown in moving pictures. From every standpoint—scenic, dramatic and educational—it is wonderful.

COMPENSARC
This Machine cuts 2/3 from your Light Bills

Mr. Manager

If you are on a 110 or 220 volt circuit and you are using a rheostat to reduce the voltage to 35 at the arc in your lamp, you are paying for 2/3 more "juice" than you are actually using. Can you afford to waste all this energy supplied from the line, over and above what you really need?

The Fort Wayne Compensarc saves all this waste by reducing the voltage without losing any: makes a clearer, whiter, steadier light, and eliminates all danger of fires caused by overheated rheostats.

We have a little 22 page booklet "Compensarc vs. Rheostat" that we want to send you. It will tell you plainly how you can make a big saving and a better light. Send us your name and address.

WHEN THEY GREW JEALOUS (May 25).—Though hubby and wifey are of a jealous nature, they are happy together. The boys at the office, knowing their nature, fill hubby's pockets with fake letters from an actress. Of course the wife finds them and immediately she decides to seek the advice of mother. While on her way to mother she slips and sprains her ankle; she is brought home in Uncle Bill's auto. Hubby observes his wife pass in a strange car and he too becomes jealous. He rushes home only to see the stranger bidding the wife an affectionate goodby. A quarrel results and they separate, hubby taking up his abode at the club while wifey goes home to mother.

In the meantime the good natured Uncle has learned of the scheme of the office boys put through and of the jealousy of the young couple. When the wife returns to her house to get her belongings she finds everything of value gone. Hubby joins her, and thoroughly scared lest they have lost their property, they rush through the house together. In an upper room they find a note from Uncle telling them to forget their jealousy and live happy. They do.

BRONCHO.

THE WHARF RATS (May 27).—Most mothers are more or less mistaken in their sons. Mrs. Reed loved so blindly her younger boy, Edward, who was a clever scamp, that her elder son, Jim, a big-hearted but rather stupid chap, failed to come in for his deserved share of mother affection. Jim was always down on his luck, while Edward was never lacking for good clothes and plenty of money to jingle in his pockets. And Jim knew where his brother got his money and his clothes, too, but would never have thought of "squealing" on him.

The fact was, Edward belonged to a gang of "Wharf Rats," who pillaged freight boxes and robbed anybody whom they could hold up around the piers. With gangsters, it is but a step from robery to blacker crimes. A certain old man who had sold a boat and had the cash in his pockets was assaulted and killed. Edward Reed escaped but was run down by the police—and Jim, to save his mother from a broken heart, offered himself up as the murderer. On the way to jail, however, he makes his getaway.

Several months later, in a western city, Jim happened to see, in a newspaper, "a personal" addressed to him. It was the dying wish of his mother to see once more the son who had disgraced her. He beat his way east on a freight train, and though, on arrival, he was recognized by the police, he managed to evade arrest and went to his mother's bedside. She must have ceased breathing but a few minutes before he entered, for the withered old face was still faintly warm, and her hand was convulsively closed upon a crumpled bit of paper. Jim drew the letter gently from the lifeless fingers. It was from Edward, confessing his past, promising to live straight for the future.

As Jim is sitting in a trance of grief, the letter on his knee, the desolate stillness is broken by voices and the tramp of feet. Rising, he quickly draws the sheet over the face on the pillow—and stepping into the adjoining room, faces the officers of the law. For her sake, Edward shall have his chance. For himself, nothing matters now.

DOMINO.

THE AMBASSADOR'S ENVOY (May 28).—A very important treaty bearing on international affairs which would, if it were known, involve the United States in a war with Japan, was signed and given to Richard Hastings to keep over night and deliver to the State Department in the morning. Baron Matsumoto, the Japanese Embassador, through secret channels, learns of this treaty and dispatches his envoy, Kamuri, to secure it. Kamuri's plans are helped by the fact that Hastings is summoned away for the night. Kamuri, with several accomplices, racks the safe in which the treaty is kept but they are foiled by the fact that Mrs. Hastings, suspecting something, had removed it previously to a far safer hiding place. Hastings returns unexpectedly, and finds Mrs. Hastings as she had been trussed up by the Japs but the treaty was saved.

BEAUTY FILM

JANE THE JUSTICE (May 26).—Jane Higgins is the handsome daughter of the Holtville constable. On her popularity she is elected Justice of the Peace, and as her knowledge of the law is somewhat limited, she deals with culprits after her own sweet will. When a charming young man is brought before her, charged with shooting on private grounds, she demands a few dollars fine, and lets him go. His brief term in court, however, has not been wasted; he and the fair justice are mutually attracted. Jane's father, greatly incensed, in his capacity of constable, orders the bold stranger away.

In the hope of being again "brought to Justice," Harry, the Hunter, invades the private domain of a certain James Dudley—Copperhead Esquire, and is discovered by the constable, trout fishing. The stern old man marches him to a cell in the Holtville lock-up, and sits down to guard the offender himself. Overcome, however, by his exertions, he falls asleep, Jane steals the keys, liberates the young man and locks up her father in his place. From her strategic position, the young woman informs the elder Higgins that she will release him only on condition that he consent to receive Harry, the Hunter, as his son-in-law. The young man is summoned to receive the paternal blessing, and Father Higgins takes the Justice of the Peace and her lawless lover to his bosom.

DRIFTING HEARTS (June 2).—The child of a wealthy young artist and his wife dies. The parents are heart-broken. Later, they drift apart, the husband seeking forgetfulness in painting, while his wife is in society. The husband becomes attracted by a model, who sympathizes with him.

The wife, believing her husband thinks more of art than of her, listens to the pleadings of an infatuated admirer. The husband writes a tender note and places it with a pearl necklace as a birthday present for his model. He is called away and the model enters; sees the note and present and is touched by this proof of love. She goes to dress for posing. The wife, who has finally consented to leave home with an admirer, enters the studio to secure a miniature of her dead child. She sees the present and the note, reads the note and thinks it is for her. It is the anniversary of their wedding day. She breaks down. Her husband returns and his wife rushes to his arms. The model, who has been an unseen witness attires herself for the street and entering the studio, shows the note to the artist, which she had hastily penned to herself, offering her a position in Paris. Knowing she is doing her duty, she says good-bye, and leaves the now happy pair. The impatient admirer, waiting at the station, decides the lady does not care for him and leaves alone.

MAJESTIC.

THE LOVER'S GIFT (Two parts—May 17).—James Dayton, a wild youth in the West, finally settles down and becomes engaged to Jess McKim, daughter of a wealthy rancher. Sheriff Reed, who has long been a protector of Jess from childhood up, warns Dayton against bad companions, but Dayton is seen talking to Daphne Dore, a woman of the underworld. The news is brought to Jess, who throws down Dayton for his conduct. Daphne, jealous of Jess, gets in an argument with Dayton, fires at him, but accidentally kills another man. Dayton is accused and hides in Jess's home. The sheriff follows, and Dayton escapes to the desert, whither the sheriff follows after discovering from Daphne the truth of the affair, and brings him back to the girl. But Dayton has shot him, believing he is after him for the killing, and the sheriff dies after safely returning Dayton to Jess's arms.

THE SWINDLERS (May 19).—A young man comes to New York to secure a position. He falls in love with his landlady's daughter and later secures a position with the firm of Get-Rich-Quick Investment Company as a solicitor. These people are swindlers, and the landlady falls victim to their lurid advertisements, through the young man. A police captain, friend of hers, informs her that the company is a swindle and that it is to be raided that night. Knowing that the boy is in their employ she forbids his associations with her daughter and accuses him of being in league with the swindlers. He pleads his innocence, and promises to get back the money which she had invested.

He hurries to the office of the company, forces his way into the president's private room and finds the crooks packing their plunder into grip sacks ready to escape by a back door. He starts to make a fuss and they hold him up with revolvers, escaping out the back door. Meanwhile the raiding police have entered the outer office. Our young man has rushed to the back door to follow the crooks, and struggles with the door. He breaks through just before the police enter the president's room. He follows the crooks and sees them escape in a taxi. In another taxi he follows, overtakes them, seizes a grip of loot, is hit over the head and dragged into the taxi. They carry him into the country and dump him out bound and gagged. After they are gone he is found by a farmer and released. He has found a sailing schedule of a steamship in the office and notes a mark against the sailing time of an Atlantic liner. He gets back to the city and is waiting at the steamship pier when the crooks disguised, arrive to sail away. Our young man penetrates the disguise and holds them up at the gangplank. Fearing a scene they give him the widow's money. The ship is ready to sail. The police are coming. The delay results in the arrest of the swindlers. The young man is off to the widow's home, where he returns her cash and is forgiven.

THE WHEELS OF DESTINY (Two Parts—May 10).—Hart was down on his luck—hungry—penniless—when Pietro Ravelli befriended him. The well-to-do Italian gave him a full meal and then conducted him through devious alley ways to an old ramshackle house, which at that late hour of the evening was swarming with Ravelli's fellow countrymen. Hart scented one of those Italian secret societies which exist in defiance of the law. Urged to cast his lot with theirs, however, a spirit of recklessness, born of the misfortunes of many bitter weeks, goaded him into accepting these desperadoes' confidences. He learned that the mano nera preyed upon people of wealth whom it blackmailed into paying large sums for their personal safety.

About a fortnight later, Hart was instructed by Ravelli to secure a position in the household of Judge Durand, a retired justice who had previously imprisoned several members of the mano nera. Ignorant of Ravelli's motives, Hart applied to the Judge and was soon made his private secretary. He fell in love with Alice Durand, his employer's

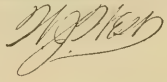
War is Hell

4 PARTS

An intensely interesting and thrilling drama of the real horrors of war and the toll it takes from the fathers and brothers and sons and sweethearts.

Here is an opinion of this feature from Kewanee, Ill.:

"War Is Hell" is one of the most satisfying pictures I ever ran. I consider it a masterpiece and its drawing power is remarkable. I did a greater business the second day than I did the first, and this in spite of the fact that the evening of the second day it rained very hard. Had it been pleasant I would not have been able to accommodate the crowds.



The Waif

6 PARTS

The little boy, stolen from his parents, wanders from town to town and leads the life of a typical street arab of the Continent. The scenes are laid in their true settings. The life shown is true in every particular. It is a thrilling story of the training of the future criminals. Forced to beg and steal for a living, the high principles of the little waif keep him straight till, after wandering over half Europe and England, he is reunited to those who love him. This is a heart-throb story for grown-ups as well as children.

4 PARTS

The original criminal gets away with the crime, which is blamed on another. Later in life the son of the real culprit has the power to make the life of the daughter of the blamed man miserable through his knowledge of the crime. The son has followed in the footsteps of his father and is pressing his advantage. Just as he seems to be going to succeed, an old partner of his father arrives and clears the name of the blamed man. This picture carries a lesson and is bound to make a big hit wherever it is shown.

daughter—but on the very evening that he was intending to ask her to marry him, he received preemptory orders from Ravelli to report to headquarters. There he was commanded, under threat of death, to kill the father of the girl he loved.

At the risk of his own life, he revealed the plot to the Judge and informed the police. All the members of the society were arrested except Ravelli who made a dramatic escape, and Hart's friends, fearful for his safety, persuaded him to go abroad. A few months later, however, news reached him on Jurge Durand's death. The same announcement came to the ever watchful eyes of Ravelli, who, knowing that his betrayer would return to comfort Alice, hid himself in the vicinity of the Durand house.

The evening of the lovers' reunion, a desparate character skulked in the street opposite the Durand grounds. There were voices beyond the hedge—Pietro Ravelli crept nearer, levelling his gun. Then out of the sense shadow of the drive, rushed a huge automobile. It reaped down the crouching man. His stifled groan was drowned in the whirring of the wheels of destiny into the darkness.

THE SOUL OF HONOR (June 13).—Old Colonel Potter had distinguished himself in 1812, and his son Dick, was made a lieutenant fighting for the confederacy. One July noon in '63, worn out with hard riding, Dick dropped from his horse at his father's house. He carried important despatches, he said, but could not resist stopping off a few hours to see his wife, Nancy, and get a rest. Nancy urged him to stay all night, but the Colonel sternly reminded the young officer that he must put his country before his happiness and Dick went that evening somewhat reluctantly, to saddle his horse. Meanwhile Nancy had let the animal loose, and despairing of being able to find the horse in the darkness, Dick gave in to her entreaties to stay.

Early next morning, a courier rode up with the news that a battle fought at dawn had been lost, because Lieutenant Potter had not reached camp with the despatches. Ignorant that his son was still under his roof the father hotly declared that he must have been killed, as otherwise a Potter would never have failed in his duty to his country. The courier rode on to trace the missing officer, and a few minutes later, the Colonel discovered his son on the point of continuing on his mission. Sick with shame, yet undinching, he told the young man that it was too late, that he had disgraced the family name and his country. Then leading him to his room, Col. Potter took down his revolver and laying it silently before Dick, left him.

The lieutenant took farewell of his wife as though he were going on his journey. Out of sight of the house, he drew rein. Then, through the still morning air, a shot rang out.

The father found his son's body five minutes after he fell. He cleaned and reloaded the revolver, placed it in Dick's belt, and simulating evidence that the young officer had been surprised and attacked, stole sorrowfully away. A little later, the courrier was stooping over the dead lieutenant. "Died like a soldier!" he muttered.

MUTUAL.

THE LIFE OF GENERAL VILLA (Seven Parts).—Vivid fighting scenes photographed under fire by Mutual cameramen under special contract with General Villa are the features of this motion picture. Many scenes are shown of the Battle of Torreon. They show the Constitutionalist forces advancing under fire with the shrapnel kicking up the dirt all around. Many other interesting scenes are shown of the artillery in action under fire, laying railroad track under fire and similar war time activities.

General Villa himself, with his generals, appears in many of the scenes. The famous Constitutionalist leader is seen to good advantage. The old saying that "War is Hell" is well exemplified in the pictures showing the burning of the dead and other views of the seamy side of the conflict.

Some of the battle scenes are shown as battle scenes. Other views of the actual fighting are worked into a film dramatization of the life of General Villa, which is preceded on the screen by a sub-title, "The Tragedy in the Career of General Villa." This tells the story of Villa's life as follows:

Years ago, Pancho Villa was a young rancher living alone with his young sister and doing well. One day a young lieutenant of the Mexican Federal Army came to that locality with another young officer. The lieutenant became smitten with Villa's sister, and with the aid of his companion, abducted her and ruined her.

The sister, after telling her brother, died, and Villa journeyed to the garrison town and killed the lieutenant, but the companion escaped. Villa then sold his rancho and with a small body of his men escaped to the mountains, vowing warfare on all mankind in revenge for the death and ruin of his sister. He became a bandit, and by meeting and defeating other bandits, became the chief of a great band and the terror of the northern part of Mexico. He was particularly sore at the Federal Government, and when the revolution broke out, he sided with the revolutionists and their leader. Sallying forth from the mountains he blew up trainloads of Federals and met and defeated every Federal army that was sent against him, captured town after town and city after city. At the last great and decisive battle he met face to face the Federal officer who had assisted in the abduction of his sister and helped to start him on his road to banditry and outlawry and kills him with his own hands upon the battlefield. The Federals are defeated, and Villa is finally proclaimed president of the great Republic of Mexico—he who once was an outlaw with a price upon his head.

HOME SWEET HOME.—The photoplay shows John Howard Payne, the author of the famous song, "Home Sweet Home," as he left his home at Easthampton, Long Island, to go upon the stage, his success there and final failure and imprisonment for debt. We then see him go abroad to England, where he writes plays, and finally is forced to sell them all in a bundle to a producing manager for a few hundred dollars. He is shown at the height of his success, at his love affair with the widow of the poet Shelley and his subsequent flouting by that lady for his more successful countryman and rival in love as well as in letters—Washington Irving. His flight to France, his writing of "Home Sweet Home," that deathless lyric, his return to the land of his birth, and at the last, his death while American consul at Tunis, alone, unhonored and unsung—and then his mother's death, disappointed and grieved that her beloved son had done so little for the world.

Then, in a series of little slices out of life, are shown the mistake his mother had made in believing her son died leaving nothing. The strains of Payne's immortal song have echoed and reechoed 'round the world and all classes and races of man and womankind have attuned their ears unto its message.

First we see a little Western frontier town with its one little lunch counter run by a young girl, "Apple Pie Mary." To the rough townsmen and the miners she is cold and hauty not to their words of love, but instead, opens the floodgates of her heart to an Eastern boy, on prospecting bent for gold. Her heart won, she would forsake this flower of the Western highways for a stately beauty of the hothouses of Eastern society, but the gentle strains of "Home Sweet Home," played by the halting and stumbling fingers of a peripatetic minestrel, guide his wandering footsteps back into the paths of duty and real love, and he finds his "Home Sweet Home" in the calico covered arms of "Apple Pie Mary."

A swift transition to another class of life, and there is seen where the walls of an apartment house are ruthlessly torn away and we see revealed a husband, elderly and past his prime, and his partner of life. The husband, immersed in the cares of business and no longer young, lavishes jewels and clothes and pleasures on his beautiful young wife, but she grows tired of them and fails to recognize the sterling worth of her husband and allows a younger and handsomer man to talk love lyrics into her ear while he urges her to leave her good but uninteresting and unromantic partner and fly with the younger Romeo, and seek unlawful happiness with each other. Torn by the struggles between her imaginary love of this youthful lover and her duty and respect for her husband, the young wife is about to leave her home when through the open window comes the haunting air of a violin. The air is "Home Sweet Home," played by the master hand of a famous violinist to a chambermaid on the floor below. Its message is clear to the young wife, and she dismisses her cavalier and remains true to the man she had wed.

A third shift on the great stage of life and is seen a poor old mother and her two sons, whom she loves and cherishes, but who are both very bad boys. One of them is fortunate enough to acquire some money, and the other covets it and attacks his brother. Both are carrying deadly hate in their hearts for each other, and in a fight to the death both are killed. The old mother is rendered insane with the shock and sits dry-eyed, shrieking aloud in her agony of heart, her very soul bared by the terrible tragedy that has come upon her, when the mellow tinkling of a guitar in the hands of a neighbor restores her to a reasonable being, and she finds peace and consolation in her faith in God. Needless to say, the mellifious melody was "Home Sweet Home!"

Thus, in a series of life's dramas of smiles and tears, is shown the influence of the most beautiful and far-reaching of songs, and it is suggested in the play that Payne's mother at last realized that her son had made one great success of his life, though it was but to be the evel-living and deathless lines of "There's no place like home!"

THE MASTER MIND (Five parts).—Pledging to revenge the execution of his brother, whom the District Attorney caused to be convicted, Richard Allen, a quaint individual who takes delight in concealing his identity by playing the role of a valet to an extravagant young man in New York, plots for the downfall of the prosecutor and educates his cleverest female crook, "Three-Arm Fanny," with a view to having her fascinate and marry the District Attorney.

The "Master Mind," under various disguises, informs the District Attorney that he will receive the four aces at certain intervals and when he receives the ace of spades, the end will be near.

Richard Allen, known as the "Master Mind," conceives many diabolical plots looking forward to the ruination of his enemy, the District Attorney, and finally succeeds in arousing his anger and jealousy, and is about to crush the unsuspecting attorney when "Three-Arm Fanny," who has really fallen in love with her husband, pleads with the "Master Mind" to withdraw and the "Master Mind," who has come to love Fanny himself, does withdraw through love for her, and disappears, to be seen no more.

The powerful gang of crooks, over which he held a formidable leadership, is disbanded and the District Attorney, not knowing that Fanny is a reformed crook, goes on in his own way, becomes Governor of the state, and everything ends as it should.

GLORIA AMERICAN CO.

ON LIFE'S HIGH SEAS (Four parts).—We are at Naples, under the reign of the Bourbons, in the year 1820. The tyrannical rule ingenders in the population a love of country and a strong desire for liberty. The men most oppressed unite for the redemption of Italy and bind themselves by an oath; they offer their young lives as a sacrifice for the mother country. Three Bourbon officials, who are found to have taken part in this oath, are taken prisoners and condemned to death. The sad news becomes known to their comrades in the cause and they decide to save them. The fisherman Nunzio, an ardent patriot, lives in a wretched little house with his wife and son, Peppeniello. To Nunzio is given the task of saving his comrades. Everything is ready and by the words of the confederate a new hope of rescue is aroused in the dismal prison. On a dark night, when a storm is raging on the sea at the place of rescue, the officials are saved and sheltered in the cellar of the fisherman's house.

A serious illness of the wife of Nunzio darkens the joy which he feels over the success of the rescue. He does not find a way to get the necessities for the poor sick woman. Unnoticed by anyone little Peppeniello notices the arrival of the fugitives. The little boy has searched in vain for assistance for his mother and is on his way home, sad at heart, when he learns that a large sum is offered to the one who can give information about the three officials who have disappeared in the night. Urged on solely by the desire to bring aid to his mother, he hastens to the chief of police and bertays the secret of his house.

The three officials are again taken into custody, and Nunzio, when he learns the terrible truth, drives little Peppeniello from the house, who is guilty only of loving his mother, and then Nunzio gives himself up to his comrades, accusing himself of being the indirect cause of the ruin of his confederates. Justice is to be executed, but Peppeniello, who has realized the seriousness of his mistake, arrives after many hardships in time to confess his guilt. Advised by the sergeant, Aniello, he sets fire to a little building at the prison, where his father is also confined, as the police have succeeded in arresting him. The plan works very well. Everyone is busy putting out the fire and the child succeeds in unlocking the door of the room where his father and the officials are confined. All the prisoners are set free, Nunzio alone is recaptured. He is to pay the penalty for all.

The guns of the Bourbons are ready to fire upon the fisherman, when Peppeniello in desperation throws himself into his father's arms to die with him. The soldiers refuse to fire and the officer is no longer able to command. The affection of this child is very touching and everybody calls for mercy. The punishment of death is changed to everlasting exile and the family of the poor patriotic fisherman departs, never to return.

THROUGH FIRE TO FAME (Four Parts).—The Duke of Harrington, who is engaged to the Baroness Rauxel, a millionairess, is in financial difficulties, and is beset by his creditors for immediate settlement of their claims. In agony of mind, he cannot conceive how his honor can be saved, until he recalls a dangerous and daring "Fire Act," which he witnessed years ago in India, and which he thinks might be turned to good account as a music-hall "turn." Disguising himself, he secures a two months' contract to perform such act, at a salary of £1,000 per month, under the pseudonym of "The Great Unknown."

While signing the contract he is introduced to Lola Vandissen, an actress who evinces great interest in his forthcoming performance. The first night arrives, and the thrilling "Fire Act" is received with tremendous ovation from both audience and members of the company.

The identity of "The Great Unknown," however, remains a secret, and he continues his attentions to the Baroness, who, hearing of the wonderful performance, asks him to take her to the theater to witness it. He cannot refuse, and conducts her one evening, but arranges with an attendant to call him away on "business" just before his turn is due. This is done, the "Fire Act" is given, and he returns to the Baroness. While behind the scenes, however, he is a witness of Lola's jealousy, who creates a scene when she discovers her fiance in the act of kissing another artist. "The Unknown" calms Lola's temper, and her interest in him is further aroused, until she determines to discover his identity. She encounters him entering his dressing room without his disguise, but he eludes her, although she waits for him to emerge after his act. It is apparent, however, that Lola and "The Unknown" are attracted to each other, although Lola creates another scene with her fiance on account of his attentions elsewhere.

One night, during the performance of the "Fire Act" there is an accident to "The Unknown" apparatus. The theater catches fire, and in the panic which ensues, and which is most realistically portrayed, a performing baboon, which has been continually tormented by Lola's fiance, breaks loose from its cage. The "Unknown," seeing the animal at liberty, takes refuge in the corridor of the theater, from where he is a witness to Lola's fiance being overcome by smoke, and falling senseless to the ground, and to the baboon, who has been trained to use a knife, finding him and instantly stabbing him to death, afterwards escaping through a window.

Lola, who has previously been rescued from the flames by "The Unknown," rushes along the corridor and discovers the dead body of her fiance. She is horror-stricken and falls on her knees, staining her dress with his blood. She is discovered by the other artists and attendants, and promptly accused of the murder, and although the "Unknown" is aware of the actual culprit, he is afraid to speak for fear of betraying his identity and thus jeopardizing his engagement with the Baroness. Lola is brought to trial. "The Unknown" engages the best known counsel to conduct her defence, and, by an irony of fate, is chosen as foreman of the jury.

The day of the trial arrives, and the court scene is in harmony with the gorgeous staging of the whole production—magnificently represented. Evidence is given that Lola was found beside the dead man's body, and that her handkerchief and dress were besmeared with blood, while several witnesses testify to the scenes which aroused her jealousy at the theater. Notwithstanding all the efforts of the Duke, she is found guilty, but before sentence is pronounced, the Duke's conscience triumphs and he asks to be allowed to speak. Amid breathless excitement he explains how he, the Duke, is the famous "Great Unknown," and tells the court how he witnessed the murder by the Baboon.

Among the audience in the court is the Baroness, his fiancee, who, at his explanation, leaves the court in disgust. The verdict is reversed, Lola is released, and on the following morning she is seen entering her rooms accompanied by the Duke. She thanks him for saving her life, and tells him of her intentions of going abroad. This the Duke will not hear of, and instances his devotion in having announced his identity in order to save her life. Lola needs little convincing of the depth of the Duke's love for her, and the story ends with the lovers in close embrace.

THE HEART OF MIDLOTHIAN (Five Parts).—Effie and Jeanie are the two daughters of a humble Highlander, Crofton Deans. Jeanie is engaged to a young minister, but Effie is secretly married to a notorious outlaw, her sister alone being aware of this. Effie obtains work in an Edinburgh harness-maker's shop. A letter from the outlaw tells her that he has succeeded in finding a home for her with Old Margery, who lives in the woods with her half crazy daughter, Madge Wildfire. Here a child is born to Effie and the outlaw begs her to keep silent, assuring her that both their lives depend upon it, for in those days if a woman concealed the birth of her child and any mishap overtook it, she was held to be guilty of murder. Madge, who has been driven mad by the loss of her own baby under somwhat identical circumstances, steals the baby and hides it. In her despair, Effie wanders away in search of the little one and eventually arrives at her father's home, distraught and in a sad plight. The outlaw, in the meantime, hears of Effie's misfortune, and abuses Old Margery for her carelessness. Thereupon, in order to be avenged on the outlaw, Old Margery informs the authorities and Effie is consequently dragged from her father's home and arrested on a charge of murdering her baby.

Meanwhile, Crazy Madge, leads the soldiers to the outlaw's hiding place but he eludes them. Effie's trial comes in, and everything hangs upon whether Jeanie will admit that she knew of her sister's condition. Although loving her sister devotedly, Jeanie cannot tell the lie that would save Effie and the sentence of death is pronounced. Jeanie then shows the depth of her affection by going on foot to London, to get a pardon from the king through the influence of John, Duke of Argyle, but Crazy Madge and Old Margery plan to kidnap the girl lest their scheme of vengeance should miscarry. They are successful but at the last moment the discursive mood of Crazy Madge changes and she assists Jeanie to escape. She at last arrives in London and, by the aid of John, she secures an audience with Queen Caroline and Lady Suffolk and although at first start the case seems hopeless a pardon is promised to her. A few days later the pardon arrives, and Jeanie sets out for Edinburgh. She arrives on the outskirts of the town on the morning of the execution and is again waylaid by Madge and Old Margery. Old Margery attempts to shoot her but once again the unstable mind of the mad girl veers round and, stepping in front of Jeanie, she receives the bullet and is mortally wounded. Jeanie hastens on and arrives at the place of execution. The outlaw, in the meantime, finds the baby in Madge's keeping and arrives upon the scene. Thus the complete innocence of Effie is proved. The final tableau shows the Outlaw, his wife and child happily reunited.

him is that of a devoted daughter, but she manages to conceal her surprise, and, out of sheer gratitude and a mistaken sense of duty, she throws her arms around him, and consents to be his wife. Ned returns from Boston. Crystal talks over with him the great debt of gratitude they owe Terry, and they both agree to sacrifice their love on the altar of duty.

Two years elapse. Terry and Crystal are married and are the parents of a little girl, named Crystal, after her mother. Ned, who left home shortly after their marriage, has not returned. Owen, who has been shyly courting Aunt Becky, is a guest at dinner in the Dennison household and insists, as always, that an extra place be set at the table in the event of Ned's unexpected return. When Ned actually bursts in upon them he receives a warm welcome. His return has been prompted by his uncontrollable love for Crystal and, after dinner, while strolling along the beach, he urges her to go away with him. Crystal's answer is to point to her wedding ring.

Terry, standing on the rocks above the beach, has heard all. Overwhelmed by the knowledge that Ned and Crystal have sacrificed their own happiness in his behalf, he decides to go away forever. He makes a confidant of Owen, but pretends to others that business complications make it necessary for him to leave his home town. Before leaving, however, he exacts an oath from Ned that in case he should not return or not be heard from after an elapse of five years, he (Ned) will make Crystal his wife. Five years elapse. A vessel is wrecked and blows up on a reef. A sailor, who is washed upon the beach in an exhausted condition, is nursed back to life by an old beachcomber. The sailor proves to be Terry, who is now totally blind.

Ned and Crystal, with Terry's little daughter, enter a churchyard. The child picks flowers to place on the monument that has been erected to the memory of Terry Dennison. Crystal and Ned, accompanied by their friends, enter the church. It is the day of their wedding. Terry enters the churchyard, feeling his way with a cane, and sinks exhausted by the side of his own monument. Little Crystal approaches and chats in a friendly manner with the old sailor. He tells her that he is blind, and asks her to spell out the name on the monument for him. When he realizes from what she says that he has been talking to his own child, he is greatly overcome with emotion. While the child is trying to comfort him, the wedding party emerge from the church. Crystal does not recognize Terry, but Owen is not deceived, and, promising to look after the old sailor, tells Crystal he will be at her house later on. By this time Owen and Aunt Becky have been married, and in order not to sadden Ned and Crystal's wedding day, Owen takes Terry to his own home, where he puts him to bed. But he soon has to break the sad news to them as Terry is nearing his end. Thereupon Crystal, Ned and Terry's little daughter hasten to Owen's cabin, where they are seen weeping around the bedside of poor old Terry, who smiles with happiness at the fulfillment of his most cherished wish.

THE WHITE LIE.—Maud was married to a very well educated man, who had drifted down to the lowest depths and had become associated with several men of very bad character. On the day the story opens Ralph Ansell, her husband, returns, followed shortly after by one of his original friends, who proposes that they should commit burglary and endeavor to obtain some very valuable jewelry, which he has located in a wealthy residence.

Maud, hating the life that she is being forced to lead, decides to leave her husband and go away. The poor girl wanders about homeless and is taken care of by some nuns, who train her as a nurse. Meanwhile Ralph Ansell and his friend, Joe Carter, in the act of committing the burglary are discovered and traced to their hiding-place. A desperate encounter follows. Ralph is shot by the police while trying to swim the river, and Joe Carter is caught and sentenced to seven years' imprisonment.

Maud is not aware of these facts, and some years later, while nursing the Earl of Bracondale, she reads the news of the release of Joe Carter, and the history of the case is revived and mention made of her husband's death. At this time the Earl of Bracondale has become infatuated with Maud and proposes marriage. While they are spending their holiday at the Seaside, Ralph Ansell, who is supposed to have been fatally shot by the police, but who had cleverly escaped, recognizes his wife. He follows her and endeavors to blackmail her. He is successful in forcing her to make an appointment at midnight, when she promises to hand him over her jewelry, as she has no actual money to give him. By curious coincidence, Joe Carter had that night intended to burglarize the place, no tknowing who resided there. He breaks into the house and is disturbed by footsteps. Hiding behind the curtain, to his astonishment he sees Maud enter the room, followed immediately after by Ralph Ansell (whom he thought dead) and notices the passing of the jewelry. A dispute arises between Maud and Ralph and he is about to kill her. This is too much for Joe Carter (who had always had a secret love for Maud) and in a fit of desperation he shoots his late co-partner in crime. Realizing that he has aroused the household with the noise of the revolver, he begs Maud to accept the revolver and suggests that Ralph was killed in self-defense, he escaping unknown. Captain Richard Alston, a handsome young officer, tries to make up for the husband's neglect by paying the pretty wife decided attention. Dr. Warren's suspicions are aroused, but at this juncture he is called away by an attack of plague at the river camp, some distance away, where a serum that he has discovered is demanded to stem the death rate. Dr. Warren works heroically among the wretched huts of the natives, nursing the sick and burning down the hovels to prevent the spread of the infection. In her loneliness, Alice sends for Captain Alston. On the road he encounters a child stricken with the plague. Alston puts the little one on the saddle before him and gallops away toward the hospital. When later he arrives at the Warren villa he reels with an awful sickness—the deadly infection has overtaken him. Alice, horrified and distressed, suddenly discovers a note to her husband, advising him of the plague at the river camp. This is her first knowledge of the reason for his absence, and suddenly she realizes that it is her husband she fears for most, and loves most, after all. At this moment the Indian servant announces the approach of Dr. Warren, returning after successfully accomplishing his surgical labors. Alice drags Alston into an adjoining room and goes to meet her husband. The doctor wonders at her nervous, frightened manner, when there is a sudden crash in the next room. The doctor rushes in, followed by Alice, following, and finds Captain Alston prostrate on the floor. Alice springs between the angry husband and the helpless officer. Dr. Warren pushes her aside, and going into his laboratory, selects a revolver from the wall. As he turns to go, Alice confronts him and forcefully reminds him of his duty as a soldier and a surgeon. Torn by conflicting emotions, but moved by his sense of professional duty to suffering humanity, the doctor hesitates only a moment. Forgetting all other impulses, he treats and cures the stricken captain. After Alston recovers, he goes to the doctor and promises to do whatever may be asked of him as atonement. The doctor asks him to promise to leave the country forever. Then, turning to his wife, he tells her to choose whether she will go with the captain or remain with him. Alice, now awakened to the full nobility of her husband, asks him to let her remain. The doctor, too, realizes his neglect of Alice, and husband and wife are at last united on the basis of a greater understanding and a truer and more abiding bond.

FAMOUS PLAYERS.

A WOMAN'S TRIUMPH (Four parts).—Jeanie and Effie Deans are the two daughters of old David Deans, a thrifty Scotchman and strict church member, living near Edinburgh. David has reared his daughters in accordance with his rigid and austere ideas of life. The two sisters are as different in appearance and mind as two people could possibly be. Jeanie is steady, calm, noble and unaffected in dress and manner, while little Effie is gay and flighty, fond of finery and flirtations. Arriving at womanhood, Effie falls in love with young Georgie Robertson, the prodigate son of a rich minister. Georgie has wandered far from his father's home and fold, and in his love for adventure becomes entangled with a band of smugglers. Under promise of marriage, Georgie often meets Effie secretly and gains her love and trust; but on his way to their prospective marriage is waylaid and arrested, in company with the leader of the smugglers, and thrown into prison. Effie has kept her family in ignorance of her love and betrothal, and has withheld from Jeanie even a greater secret—that she is to become a mother. Crushed by her misfortune, little Effie manages to secure a position in Edinburgh, and there receives word from Georgie, in prison, to go in her hour of trouble to friends of his who will care for her. She goes to these people, Madge Wildfire and her mother, a strange, eccentric pair, the mother a wicked old hag, the daubgter demented through grief over her dead babe. They shelter Effie while her own little one is born, but the crazed Madge steals the young infant, leaving it alone by the roadside. The child is rescued by strangers, but is lost to Effie, who finally returns home, still guarding her sad secret. And there, for a time, she finds peace and quiet. But the old hag, fearing lest Effie accuse Madge of stealing the child, determines to accuse Effie of killing her own babe. Effie is torn from her dazed and grief-stricken family and thrust into prison, awaiting trial. During this lapse of time Robertson has escaped from prison, and incited a riot to rescue the smuggler-leader, who is popular among the town folks. Learning that Effie, too, is in the prison, Robertson also strives to effect her release. To his alarm and surprise, Effie refuses to leave the prison until her innocence is proved, and he is forced to leave without her. Desperate, he remembers the old Scotch law to the effect that if the accused has told any of her family that she is to become a mother, the statement is accepted as an evidence that she does not intend the death of her child. Robertson therefore writes Jeanie, begging her to meet him at midnight at an old church, and bidding her tell no one why he wishes to see her. This note he gives to Mr. Butler, a young minister, who loves Jeanie and is loved by her. Butler bears the note to Jeanie, pleading to know the reason for this appointment; but she steadfastly refuses to tell him, causing an estrangement between them. Jeonie meets Robertson, and he pleads with her to lie in court and thus save her sister. Meanwhile, Butler has been questioned by the authorities, on the occasion of a visit to Effie, as to his acquaintance with the escaped prisoner, Robertson, and is forced to reveal the contents of the note he bore to Jeanie. A searching party goes in pursuit of Robertson, led by Madge Wildfire, who knows the district better than the others. Madge divines the men mean danger to Robertson, whom she admires, and warns him with a wild song, so that he escapes in time, but without having secured Jeanie's promise. Jeanie visits Effie in prison, and is again begged to tell one little lie to save her sister's life, but she cannot escape her slavery to truth and honor, and refuses. At the trial Effie is condemned to die. Jeanie then goes barefoot to London and begs the Queen for her sister's life, telling her all. Though they offer the pardon in exchange for Robertson's hiding place, she staunchly refuses to reveal it. Her loyalty and strength appeal to the Queen's sympathies, and she grants the pardon. Stopping for nothing, she hastens back to the prison, and reaches the place of execution just in time. And so Jeanie slaves her sister's life without the blight of having told a lie.

a match, the fight to be for very heavy stakes between two fighters who have never been in the prize-ring before. The challenge is accepted after the terms have been modified to include any man who has not been in the ring for five years. This enables Sir Charles, in default of a better nominee, to make use of the services of Ginger Stubbs, an old prize-fighter who has been to the wars with Captain Jack as a servant.

In the meantime, Lady Temperley has persuaded her ward, Ethel, who is an heiress in her own right, to marry Sir Charles. Ethel, who has lived with the Temperleys all her life, is much moved by Lady Temperley's distress, and agrees, although she is really in love with Jack Temperley. Later, when Jack declares his love, Ethel tells him of her engagement to Charles, and Jack, broken-hearted, determines that when the forthcoming fight is over he will leave the country.

Sir John Hawker receives disturbing reports of Ginger Stubbs' progress in training, and fears the result. He arranges with Jakes to have Ginger Stubbs carried off on the eve of the fight. The fight will then be awarded to Gloster Dick. By a ruse Ginger Stubbs is accordingly seized and carried off; but, at the last moment, just the referee is about to award the match to Gloster Dick, Jack Temperly, himself a skilful amateur, throws his hat in the ring, fights for Sir Charles, and wins an exciting battle. Sir Charles has previously discovered that Ethel is in love with Jack, and knowing that Hawker is a dead shot, sees in a duel an opportunity for him to clear the way for the two lovers.

Sir John Hawker unsuccessfully schemes to break up the ring; Sir Charles accuses him of this, and, after an angry scene a duel is arranged. Sir John fires before the signal is given, wounding Sir Charles, who returns the fire with fatal effect. Sir Charles Temperley, in the final scene, joins the hands of Jack and Ethel, contented in the knowledge that the fortunes of the House of Temperley are now safe.

THE MILLION DOLLAR ROBBERY (Four parts).—Falsely accused of the theft of a million dollars in securities from the safe of his wealthy employer, an honest young private secretary finds himself powerless to prove his innocence because of the perjury of an unprincipled butler who has been bribed to testify against him.

The daughter of his employer is the innocent cause of the activity of his powerful enemy, who is an influential banker and the rival of the secretary for the hand of the girl. One of the secretary's cuff links found near the looted safe suggests to the banker the possibility of fixing the crime upon him. The butler accepts a large sum of money from the banker in return for bearing false witness, but is suspected of dishonesty by the band because of his sudden show of wealth. Detectives are put upon his track, but he learns of his danger and succeeds in effecting his escape, thus making it appear that he himself is guilty of the theft. As a hunted criminal with the police instructed to arrest him on sight he becomes a desperate character and selects the banker as a likely subject for a successful scheme to obtain money. By a clever ruse he obtains an audience with the banker, leaving him bound and gagged several thousands dollars poorer. But his bold move leads to his discovery by the police, who follow him successfully in spite of a spectacular flight in which Broadway, the Bowery, the Brooklyn Bridge and Flushing Railway Station play an important part. The opening of a large cantalever bridge at the psychological moment places the butler in the clutches of the law, but the banker is afraid to identify him as his assailant and there is no direct proof of his connection with the million dollar robbery.

Expert find only the safe owner's finger prints upon the combination of the safe, and a famous detective becomes interested in the peculiar case. He looks up the life history of the victim of the robbery and finds that the old capitalist suffers from a common but little understood affliction. By substituting a hypnotist for the old gentleman's barber he succeeds in obtaining a statement which proves that the capitalist removed the money box from the safe with his own hands and hid it in a fireplace while walking in his sleep. The butler is immediately accused of perjury, but fights desperately against arrest and when finally cornered leaps from the top of a high building to his death. The capitalist carefully follows the instructions given by himself while hypnotized and finding his loot safe and with intact, begs the forgiveness of his falsely accused secretary and welcomes him as the husband of his daughter.

THE LOTTERY OF LIFE (Three parts).—Unutterably shocked is Frederick Sawyer when he received a letter informing him that his brother Harold had committed suicide mysteriously. No reason for his act is known save that he was a member of the Mysterious Club, an organization of sinister name and reputation. Engaging a detective, Sawyer attempts to solve the mystery. They learn that the members of the Mysterious Club all insure their lives heavily, naming the Mysterious Club as beneficiary.

John Van Geldern is introduced to Sawyer at a social gathering. Van Geldern's suave and gracious personality has its effect upon Sawyer. Van Geldern is suspected of having evil designs upon Sawyer. The detective and Sawyer's sweetheart, Edna Brown, watch him carefully. Sawyer is blind to the intentions of Van Geldren and does not suspect that he is being stalked as a potential new victim. To confirm their suspicions, the detective and Edna trail the suspected man as he winds his way through the mazes of wharves and buildings at the water-front. He disappears suddenly in a mysterious passageway and they are compelled to abandon the surveillance.

Van Geldern offers Sawyer membership in the Mysterious Club. In his blind belief in Van Geldern, he forgets that the Mysterious Club was the cause of his brother's death and accepts the invitation. Accompanied by Van Geldern, Sawyer goes to the headquarters of the Club and Van Geldern convinced of his mental power over Sawyer, has the temerity to tell him that the Mysterious Club is an organization for men indifferent to life. "At certain of our meetings," he goes on, "each member selects a card and whoever draws the ace of spades has to follow instructions, after insuring his life, naming the Club as beneficiary." Foolishly, Sawyer accepts the membership. He sits at the table and the cards are shuffled. Of course he draws the fateful ace of spades. Van Geldern tells him that he has a choice of deaths. A revolver and a bottle of poison lie on the table. Withdrawing into an adjoining room, the Club members await the sound of a body falling to the floor.

Edna and the detective, learning that Sawyer had gone to an unknown destination with Van Geldern, have again tried to find the place where Van Geldern had disappeared. Successful, they enter the building. Becoming separated, the detective strays into the room, where he finds Sawyer covering the Mysterious Club members with the revolver given him to shoot himself. He had decided that he did not care to die. The girl rushes in at the door at the end of the room where the Club members are. Van Geldern holds her in front of him to prevent Sawyer from shooting. Van Geldern, dragging Edna, goes to the roof. A wild chase over the house tops. Still pulling the girl after him, Van Geldern jumps into a boat. A hot pursuit by the police and Sawyer. The girl finds an opportunity to escape and she is rescued. Van Geldern snatches at a rope attached to a drawbridge. The bridge breaks in the center and Van Geldern is drawn high aloft. Unable to climb to safety he drops into the water and is captured. With his arrest "The Lottery of Life" ceases.

MR. BARNES OF NEW YORK (Six Parts).—Mr. Barnes of New York, a wealthy American traveling in Europe, meets Count Musso Danella, who invites the American to visit his estate in Corsica. While there, Barnes meets Marina Paoli, the Count's ward, who is anxiously awaiting the return of her brother, Antonio, an officer in the service of France. A few days later, Barnes fails in an attempt to prevent a duel between Antonio and an English officer, who kills Antonio and leaves behind a revolver borrowed from a brother officer. Marina and the Count arrive after the English officer had boarded his ship, Marina swearing vengeance against her brother's unknown slayer.

In her search for the English officer, Marina, the Count and Tomasso, her foster father, go to Egypt. They arrive after the bombardment of Alexandria, in July, 1882, and their search takes them even into the hospitals filled with the wounded. There Marina meets Lieut. Gerald Anstruther who has been badly injured and whom she nurses back to health. Later they fall in love.

In the meantime, Barnes meets and falls in love with Lieut. Anstruther's cousin, Enid. In Monte Carlo, Barnes and Enid meet Marina, Enid learning that Marina and her brother are engaged. Business takes Barnes to London. While he is gone, the Count, from Gibraltar, advises Marina that he has found her brother's slayer. His suspicions are founded on the fact that the revolver with which Antonio was killed is the property of Lieut. Anstruther. The Count does not know that Marina is engaged to the English officer.

The Count succeeds in bringing the Lieutenant to Monte Carol. Marina, through her love, has abandoned her vendetta, and the Count, through jealousy, determines to permit Marina to marry the Lieutenant before he tells her that it is the Lieutenant whom she seeks to destroy. Barnes, in London, learns of the conditions, and knowing Lieut. Anstruther to be guiltless, hastily returns to Corsica. He arrives a few hours after the wedding.

The Count tells Marina that she has married her brother's slayer and endeavors to have her kill her husband. She refuses, whereupon Tomasso, the foster father, proceeds to carry out the vendetta. Through a mistake, Tomasso kills the Count instead, and Barnes arrives just in time to explain everything, recall Marina to her husband's love, thus preventing further bloodshed. He also succeeds in his own love affair with Enid.

LOVE, LUCK AND GASOLINE (Three Parts).—Bunny's daughter, Lillian, is quite justly known as Miss Tomboy. She returns the love of Cutey, a wealthy young chap, whom Bunny does not favor. Bunny does his best to prevent meetings between his daughter and Cutey, so everything develops into a battle of wits between Bunny and the combined forces of Miss Tomboy and Cutey. Bunny becomes owner of a fast sailboat, just about the time Miss Tomboy wins a swimming race in which she wears a boy's costume. For this prank, her father locks her in her room for a week, taking all her pretty clothes away from her. While she is in this dilemma, Cutey learns that Bunny's captain has been taken ill, a fact which will probably cause Bunny to lose the race in which his new sailboat is enterer.

Cutey figures that Miss Tomboy can sail the boat to victory, so he succeeds in getting a suit of his clothes to the girl. She climbs down the porch, and true to his prediction, proves herself the winner. Bunny is delighted until he learns that it was his daughter who so ably handled his fast little craft, then his delight turns to chagrin and he determines to make Miss Tomboy sail to his friend, Van Alstyne, an impossible being for Miss Tomboy. She determines to elope with Cutey and sends him word to have his fast steam yacht ready to make a rush for Newport. Van Alstyne learns of the scheme, advises Bunny and they start in pursuit in Bunny's steam yacht, a much faster vessel. In his dilemma, Cutey sends a wireless to his friend who owns a fifty-mile-an-hour racing motor boat. Immediately the friend sets out and soon passes Bunny's yacht and overtakes Cutey and Miss Tomboy, taking them aboard and starting another race for Newport.

Bunny, in determination, starts after the speedy motor boat in a hydro-aeroplane. Miss Tomboy sees him coming and Cutey hurries to shore and succeeds in getting a racing monoplane. Bunny, in his anxiety to have his aviator overtake the monoplane, fails out of the dying boat into the water, being rescued by his daughter and Cutey. The battle of wits convinces Bunny that Cutey would make a worthy son-in-law so he gives his consent. Cutey and Miss Tomboy fly across the sea to happiness just as Van Alstyne hurriedly arrives. He is too late, and Bunny's sense of humor permits him to enjoy a good laugh at the expense of the crestfallen Van Alstyne.

FACING THE FOOTLIGHTS (Three parts—Pathe).—Marjorie Helms and her husband, a young inventor, are thoroughly in love with each other and happy in their simple home life with their one child, a little daughter. Helms is conducting experiments with a view of improving certain high explosives and seems in a fair way of obtaining success. His laboratory being in his house, his wife has a habit of calling for him when it is time for him to finish his evening's work.

With their little daughter she calls on him one day at the laboratory and the child pleading with her father to make some fireworks for her, he explodes a small quantity of powder. His wife and child have no sooner left the laboratory than they hear an explosion and see a burst of flame from the building. A spark from the impromptu firecracker had found its way unseen into the closet where the chemicals are stored and havoc results.

With the aid of a servant, Marjorie rescues her husband from the wrecked and burning building. He is carried to a hospital, where he lies ill for a long time before he is recovered. His wife, in the meantime, has had a laboratory built and equipped for him and what with hospital expenses and other needed expenditures, finds that their funds are exhausted and some laboratory bills still unpaid. She fears to tell her husband, as she wishes to keep him from worry, and determines to shoulder the burden herself. Going to Matcham, a theater manager and close friend of her husband's, she asks for his advice. He proffers to her a profitable engagement at his theater to pose for classical living pictures. With great reluctance and distress she accepts, but on the condition that her husband be kept in ignorance.

She appears before the footlights and wins success, and each night as soon as she can leave the theater hurries to the laboratory to get her husband as had been her habit. All is well for a while, but something excites his suspicion and he determines to spy upon her. He follows her to the stage entrance of the theater, and then buys a ticket for the performance. Dumbfounded, he sees his wife upon the stage and on the conclusion of her act goes directly home. His wife calls at the laboratory and fails to find him there. Going to the house, she finds him a changed and angry man. He overwhelms her with abuse and vituperation until she falls fainting to the floor. Later when she has recovered from her swoon, but is still weak and ill, he goes to her still determined on his course. She asks him to bring her the strong box and then shows him the unpaid bills, the theater contract and all the evidences of their need for money. He is overwhelmed in the face of the facts and full of contrition and humility begs his wife for forgiveness, which she grants.

forces. Under his supervision, fortifications are erected on the Isle of Orleans, to protect the approach to the city. The general gains the enmity of Vaudreuil, the vainglorious governor, when he protects Mignon Mars from the unwelcome attentions of the latter. Mignon's brother enlists in the French army and is made an officer. The English fleet carrying Wolfe's men arrives off the Isle of Orleans. Wolfe entices the Canadian pilots aboard his vessel by raising the French flag. The pilots are compelled to take the fleet up the river, under penalty of death. Mignon discovers Wolfe's ruse and rides to warn Montcalm of the approach of the English fleet.

Wolfe lands his soldiers on the Isle of Orleans, twelve miles below Quebec. The fleet then proceeds up the river and anchors before Quebec. In an effort to destroy the fleet, Montcalm prepares fire ships. But the wind and the tide are against the French, and the fire ships drift ashore. Under orders from the young commander-in-chief, Monckton, one of the British generals, seizes Point Levis, overlooking Quebec. Wolfe offers amnesty to the Canadians who lay down arms. The inhabitants, however, prove unruly. Later, the English batter away at Quebec, with the fortifications at Point Levis and the guns of the fleet. The bombardment does terrific destruction, houses being riddled by the shot and shell, while fires, caused by the rain of death, spring up everywhere. Bushwackers attack the Chateau Mars, on the Isle of Orleans, the home of Mignon. The girl and her father are in dire peril, when Wolfe and his men approach and drive the renegades before them. Wolfe makes the chateau his headquarters.

Wolfe orders an attack on the French redoubts above Montmorenci Falls. The impetuosity of the Grenadiers leads them to disobey orders, with the result that the English are compelled to retreat, after a desperate battle. The approach of the Highlanders, who cover the retreat of the army, saves the English from annihilation. Lieutenant Arleigh strives in vain to check the retreat. Fighting like a hero, he is shot by an Indian, a Caughnawaga ally of the French. The redskin is about to scalp the young soldier when Hubert Mars comes to the rescue. The Canadian saves Arleigh's life, but is himself desperately wounded. Wolfe is greatly downcast by the defeat. He returns to the chateau in dejection. Mignon looks in vain for her English lover. She learns that he is among the missing. Setting forth, she searches the battlefield among the dead and wounded. Mignon hears that Hubert is wounded and goes to the hospital to see him. To her delight, she sees Arleigh lying on the cot next to her brother. Mignon returns to the chateau and reports to Wolfe that his young aide is captured. That night, Arleigh makes his escape by changing cots with a French soldier who has died. He dons the man's uniform and leaves the hospital. Later, Arleigh succeeds in escaping through the French lines. He swims out to the English fleet.

The following day, Mignon returns to the hospital and is informed that Arleigh is dead and has just been buried. Heartbroken, she returns home with the sad news. Wolfe is stricken with a fatal illness and learns that he cannot recover. During his sickness, his brigadiers recommend an attack without his knowledge. Wolfe learns of it. Despite his weakness, the commander-in-chief rises from his bed and goes to take command. In his escape, Arleigh has learned of Montcalm's intention to send boats and supplies down the river at nightfall. He returns to the chateau and delivers his information to Wolfe. Mignon is overjoyed to find her sweetheart safe. Wolfe lays out the narrow path leading up the mountain side to the Plains of Abraham. The English troops are sent down the river and due to the password given by Arleigh are enabled to slip by the French sentries. All night long the English toil up the mountainside. When morning dawns, they are drawn up in battle array on the Plains of Abraham. The fight commences.

Montcalm, emerging from his tent, grows uneasy when he hears the sound of firing. He learns of the state of affairs. The bugles summon the French troops to battle and they march forth to the Plains of Abraham. Montcalm calls upon Vaudreuil, the governor, for assistance, but that cowardly official refuses to render aid. The French approach within firing distance of their foe. Wolfe delivers a stirring address to his men as the French approach. The battle commences. The opposing forces come together with a clash that sends both sides reeling. Forward they spring, slashing and stabbing like madmen. Wolfe is in the thickest of the fray. A shot strikes him. He falls. A tremendous shouting arrests his agony.

"They run! They run!" cries one of his aides.

"Who run?" gasps Wolfe.

"The enemy!"

"Now God be praised," the dying man whispers, "I die happy."

At the same moment, Montcalm, desperately striving to check the rout, is mortally wounded. The French commander is carried to his headquarters. He is informed that his wound is mortal.

"How long shall I live?——twelve hours more or less? So much the better. I am happy that I shall not live to see the surrender of Quebec!" he gasps.

Wolfe's body is placed aboard the English flagship to commence its journey to the land for which he gave his life. Seated in a boat on the river, Arleigh and his bride, Mignon, watch the vessel sailing out towards the setting sun.

UNIVERSAL SPECIAL FEATURES.

THE SKY MONSTER (Four Parts).—Walter Johnson, a New York millionaire, decides to aid his friend and incidentally reimburse himself and secure a large wager by flying from America to Europe and return in the given period of three days.

It seems that Johnson's friend, Mr. Parker, is in love with a music hall star named Gerdie Belle, who has left America to appear in Europe. Johnson bets his friend $100,000 he will have the lady in question in America within three days from the time of his departure, and accordingly arranges his dirigible, Keppelin Victoria Luise, for the flight across the Atlantic. Johnson embarks, and after an uneventful flight, arrives in Berlin in 17 hours, where after considerable difficulty he finally locates Gerdie Belle in a moving picture studio in Berlin. She suddenly leaves, however, for Russia, where she is to appear in a musical comedy, and there is nothing to do but for Johnson to follow her in his air craft. He arrives in time for the opening performance, and takes Gerdie Belle into his confidence, but she refuses to be inveigled into the plot. By means of a bottle of chloral, Johnson succeeds in carrying her off bodily, and after an exciting chase through the wilds of Russia, he finally outdistances the Cossacks who are pursuing them, and takes her aboard his "Sky Monster."

The heroine recovers consciousness and finds herself a prisoner in Johnson's keeping, as the dirigible is now on its way towards New York. Far in the distance the continent is gradually disappearing from view, and Gerdie Belle, realizing the folly of continuing to be cold toward her captor, finally softens her heart toward his advances.

Everything points toward a successful arrival in America, but in his hurry, Johnson has forgotten to fill his tank with gasoline, and they find themselves stranded on the Atlantic, midway between America and Europe, without fuel. Luck is again with him, however, for looking in the distance they see the "Imperator," queen of the seas, approaching. They immediately get in wireless communication and tell her of their plight, and she comes to the rescue. We see the gigantic sky monster hovering over the largest vessel afloat, and they take on a goodly supply of gasoline and depart. Later the "Victoria Luise" runs into the iceberg zone, and as the cold air causes her gas to lose its buoyancy, she settles on the ocean, in danger of being wrecked any minute. Again the airship is on its way, making all haste toward the shores of the land of liberty.

About 10 o'clock on the third day, when the "Victoria Luise" is plouging through space at 280 miles an hour, a spot appears on the horizon and by means of her searchlight she is enabled to pick up the small crafts on the shore front of the great Atlantic. She is now approaching Barnegat, and turning her head northward, steers for New York at all possible haste, for seconds are now valuable. They pass along the coast by Sandy Hook and arrive at Governor's Island with only a few minutes to spare. We see the millionaire's club, with Mr. Parker surrounded by his friends, looking at his watch and rubbing his hands with glee, because he already feels sure he has won the wager. But he is mistaken, because promptly at the door opens and Johnson, who has now won the heart of his lady love, enters amid cheers. Parker feels that even though he has lost money he at least has a chance to win the heart of Gerdie Belle, for little does he suspect that Johnson has already won his way into the famous beauty's heart. There is nothing left but praise and a promise to attend the wedding of the first man to cross the Atlantic in three days and the world's famous beauty, Gerdie Belle.

WARNER'S FEATURES.

FALSE EVIDENCE (Three Parts).—John Ainsley, Sr., at his death, unable to make provision for his son, Jack, exacts from his more fortunate business partner a promise that he will take care of the lad. In accord with his pledge, Morris Cobb sends for the youth at the completion of the latter's college term. Jack then enters upon a business career with the firm of Cobb & Company, and promptly falls in love with his benefactor's daughter, Florence, much to the chagrin of Richard Hunt, business manager for Cobb & Company, also a suitor of the girl. Hunt is an unscrupulous adventurer, but he has managed to hide his defalcations and forgeries. Jack's activities and quick perception, however, cause him grave apprehension. At a ball given at the home of Cobb, Florence receives two proposals: one from Hunt, which she rejects; the other from Jack Ainsley. The latter leaves that night as the accepted suitor. Hunt is goaded by jealousy and hatred, and determines to rid himself of so formidable and dangerous a rival. He introduces Jack at his club, and readily advances money to him on his personal notes.

To recoup his loses, Jack becomes a nightly habitue of the gambling palace. At the end of his resources and pressed by Hunt for payment, Jack is obliged to give in exchange for his debts a valuable Saracen ring. Hunt sees to it that Florence is made acquainted with Jack's habits and precarious finances. Therefore, when a robbery and assault is committed by Hunt, the circumstantial evidence is subtly made to point conclusively to Jack. Florence is rudely shaken when she finds Jack's Saracen ring on the scene of the crime, and is convinced of her lover's perfidy and guilt. In withholding the ring during Jack's trial, as an act of delicacy, Florence unwittingly robs the defence of its only tangible evidence to prove his innocence. The unravelling of the plot, however, moves speedily to a happy conclusion once the girl has the right key to the situation. In the end, guilt is punished and love is triumphant.

THE WHITE GHOST (Three Parts).—Stransky, an international crook for whom the police of many countries have been searching, learns that a party of wealthy tourists are on their way to Switzerland for an outing. He poses as the Count de Ildira, and accompanied by a valet, arrives at the Grand Hotel. It required but little maneuvering on his part to be introduced to the charming Miss Merwin and her party, thus perfecting his arrangements for carrying out his blackmail scheme.

The "Count" is apparently a great lover of outdoor sports, and during the ensuing days he often accompanies Miss Merwin on skating expeditions, or climbs with her on skiis up the snow-clad mountains. On the portico of the Grand Hotel, as Miss Merwin and her admirer are watching the skating races, a message is dropped in her lap, which reads: "If your mother does not bring $2,500 within 24 hours a terrible mishap will befall you. Let her come to Raven Hill at midnight tomorrow."

(Signed) "The White Ghost."

Again and again the mysterious messages are received, and each time they are signed by the "White Ghost." Miss Merwin's friend, Lucy Cook, arrived in the company of her father and her fiance. They are much interested in the mysterious message from the "White Ghost," and Lucy's fiance volunteers to keep the midnight appointment with the "Ghost." He does so and is struck from behind and disarmed, sinking to the snow-covered ground unconscious. Meantime, Lucy, who has secretly followed, is captured and imprisoned beneath the hill in a rude cave. Lucy's brother, a famous detective, arrives and in searching for the "White Ghost" is also dropped through the trap door into the cave. He frees himself after a time and taking a dynamite cartridge from the sole of his shoe, blows a way to freedom for himself and Lucy. After returning to their hotel, the detective neatly traps the bogus count and rounds up the rest of the blackmailers just as they are about to escape by train.

THE AIR TORPEDO (Three Parts).—At the beginnig of the story Colonel Crawford has completed a device for dropping explosive shells from aeroplanes while in full flight. Requested by his government to guard the plans of the invention with his life if need be, he has installed a safe in his home in which the plans are kept.

Colonel Crawford's son is continually getting into scrapes from which he is quite often rescued by his sister, who is married to Lieutenant Gordon, an attache of Colonel Crawford's staff. Young Crawford has unfortunately borrowed twenty thousand dollars from one of his companions, who is a spy in disguise. Pressed for the money, the ungrateful son resolves to steal the plans of his father's invention to settle his loan with the scoundrelly McDonald. Young Crawford executes the theft in the middle of the night in the presence of his sister, who has followed him into the room.

When dawn breaks, Lieutenant Gordon finds his wife in a stupor, the safe door swinging open and every evidence that the thief has made a clean getaway. The military detectives who are called in to investigate, discover Lieutenant Gordon's gloves on the table, and lock him up as the culprit. To save her husband, Colonel Crawford's daughter informs her father that his son is the real thief.

Unable to bear the disgrace that an exposure of the theft will bring, Colonel Crawford resolves to sacrifice his son's life in order to regain the precious plans. Taking his seat in a hydroplane, he flies through the air and gradually overtakes the motor boat in which the conspirators are escaping. With a blinding explosion, a shell speeds downward, totally destroying the motor boat plowing through the water beneath it. Weeks after the catastrophe has occurred, the sorrowing father received a letter from his son, stating he was not on board the boat that was destroyed, having changed his plans for flight at the last minute.

TRICKED BY A VAMPIRE (Three Parts).—Very bitter over his failure to be chosen a member of Parliament in place of the renowned inventor, Forbes resorts to foul play to ruin his successful political rival. By a liberal expenditure of money, Forbes and his secretary secure the aid of Flora, a beautiful woman, but unscrupulous enough to do their bidding. At the theater she carries on a flirtation with Alfred, which results in a friendship that quickly ripens into an absorbing love affair on Alfred's part.

Forbes and his secretary are delighted with the successful termination of their scheming and they take pains to lay the trap that will bring father and son down into the mire of shame and disgrace. Some time later, Alfred informs Flora that on the following day he is to visit the Secretary of War and explain in detail to the war experts the submarine destroyer over which he and his distinguished father have labored so long. The next day Alfred receives a note from Flora, asking him to stop on his way to the war office. Flora detains him long enough toallow Forbes' secretary to photograph the precious plans and then dismiss him. The submarine ous when he discovers that his wife had left him and goes in search of her, finding the couple near an old inn. Brinsmore and Randolph settle differences with a duel and Brinsmore is the victor. When Georgia discovers Brinsmore has taken the life of her husband, she tells him to go, never to return, and so it is that the handsome Richard sails for England, leaving Georgia to take care of their child. Abroad Brinsmore marries, and Georgia suffers a broken heart.

One hundred years later, a young chap with a college education, falls desperately in love with a sweet co-ed by the name of Georgia Porter. Georgia's father had plenty of money, while the youth had barely enough to live on. Stephen Mitchell becomes the college man's rival. The college man determines to elope with Georgia and she agrees. Her father becomes furious, as young Mitchell had just loaned him $2,000 with which to pay a debt, and he had promised Mitchell the hand of his daughter. There is a wild automobile ride in which father and suitor overtake Georgia and her lover. Mitchell strikes at the college man and in self-defense Georgia's sweetheart deals the death blow. He is tried for murder and finally acquitted. Some time later, a masque ball is given and Georgia determines to wear the costume of her grandmother. Her engagement is to be announced at this social affair. With her sweetheart by her side, they resurrect the old gowns and trinkets. Then it happens—Georgia finds a note in her grandmother's trunk, written years and years ago by a Richard Brinsmore, stating "that his heart was broken, but that she had his child." The man Georgia was to be married to had the same name—he was a direct descendant of the man who had so terribly wronged Georgia's grandmother—and she refused to marry him. The young college man, Richard Brinsmore, is heartbroken. On his way home he meets with an automobile accident, bringing about the termination of a love story that had lived through generations.

MELIES—GENERAL.

THE CURSE OF GREED (Five parts—May 19).—The Marquis de Luscky, having dissipated his fortune, secures financial assistance from Elias Webb, a money-lender, who, however, declines to advance further sums when the spendthrift has no security to offer. The widowed Viscountess Kinsale is a very rich woman whose affections are bound up in Peter, her only child. De Luscky, in his extremity, thinks he sees a way out of his difficulty. If only he could marry the viscountess he would be able to restore his broken fortunes, and one morning he contrives to fall from his horse in front of the viscountess's motor car. Apparently he is severely injured and is taken into her house. When news of the accident is published, Webb writes to De Luscky advising him to lay siege to the heart of his hostess. The schemer's injuries are severe, and it is weeks before he is able to leave the house. His first call is upon Webb, who agrees to provide money to enable the marquis to marry the widow, on condition that he pays him $250,000 on the death of the viscountess and her son. Together they plan a diabolical plot. When the marriage takes place, Webb is appointed tutor to Peter, and they begin a tour of Brittany. On the second evening they are at St. Malo. Peter is taken on board a fishing boat owned by Skipper Dick, a fisherman indebted to Webb, and he agrees that during the voyage the boy shall disappear. The skipper reckons on Senan, a smuggler and salt, who befriends the boy, and they escape from the vessel. For their own vile purposes De Luscky and Webb have induced Peter's mother to believe that the boy has been drowned, and she becomes seriously ill. This gives Webb an opportunity to develop the plot, and at his instigation De Luscky poisons the water he expects his wife to drink before she sleeps. Fate intervenes. The nurse objecting, the water is taken to the drawing-room, and when the marquis returns early in the morning he drinks the poisoned water and dies. The marquise is accused of murder, and is being tried when Peter and Penrose dramatically appear in the Assize Court. The boy accuses Webb of having caused him to be kidnapped and, incriminating documents being found at his house, the marquise is discharged from custody.

CLASSMATES (Four parts—Klaw & Erlanger—Biograph).—Bert Stafford is in love with his mother's ward, Sylvia Randolph. She does not reciprocate his feelings as she is in love with Duncan Irving, son of Old Irving, the store-keeper of Pine Level, South Carolina. Although Mrs. Stafford has a daughter, Phyllis, Bert is her favorite child and she has spoiled him by her indulgence of his every whim. Duncan Irving, on the contrary, is a manly chap but unfortunately his father is a habitual drunkard. On account of Sylvia's preference for Duncan, Bert is jealous and tries to pick a quarrel with him which results in Duncan being ordered from the grounds by Mrs. Stafford. Duncan passes his entrance examinations for West Point and before leaving home tells Sylvia of his ambitions. His father resolves to stop drinking which he realizes might disgrace his son. Two years later Duncan writes his father of his promotion at West Point and the old man shows the letter to Sylvia. When Mrs. Stafford hears of Duncan's success, she decides to send Bert to West Point.

A year later the cadets are shown preparing for their annual dance, to which Mrs. Stafford, Sylvia and Phyllis are invited by Captain Lane. Duncan is now a first class man while Bert is a plebe. Bert naturally resents being compelled to take orders from Duncan or Duncan's friend Dumble. Dumble falls in love with Phyllis but she does not give him much encouragement. Duncan's father also goes to West Point but does not attend the dance, fearing his clothes might embarrass Duncan. Bert asks Sylvia to marry him but she puts him off. Bert becomes furious when he sees her talking with Duncan and resolves to get Old Irving drunk in order to humiliate Duncan. When Bert takes Old Irving to his tent he is seen by Duncan's friend, Dumble, who reports the matter to Duncan. As Sylvia has previously asked Duncan not to be hard on Bert, he resolves to respect her wishes and keeps from her the knowledge of Bert's cowardly act. Duncan finds his father in a drunken condition and Bert gloats over Duncan's humiliation and insults him. Duncan demands an apology and when Bert refuses to retract his accusation, Duncan knocks him down. When Bert is picked up he is blind and Duncan and his friends, Dumble, Clay and Lindsay, are put under arrest. Duncan and his chums are court-martialed and suspended, despite the fact that Duncan declares he alone is to blame. The Staffords move to New York and although Bert recovers his eyesight, he is declared ineligible for further military service. He again proposes to Sylvia and this time she consents to become his wife. They quarrel as to when the wedding shall take place and Bert accepts an offer from an engineering concern to go to South America. Duncan goes to Washington hoping to induce the President to lift the suspension of his friends. Their reinstatement is made subject to Mrs. Stafford's signing the petition which she refuses to do.

Nothing is heard of Bert and Mrs. Stafford is led to believe that he has died of fever many miles up the Amazon. When Duncan and his friends are informed of this they offer to lead an expedition in search of Bert. Mrs. Stafford agrees to sign the petition on condition that they bring her son back with them. Phyllis agrees to marry Dumble and have Duncan act as best man if he finds Bert. Duncan wishes to save Bert in order to win back Sylvia's respect. She gives him a message for Bert which discloses to Duncan her engagement to Bert, but he refuses to give up hope as he believes she is still in love with him, despite the engagement. The relief party arrives in South America and are soon in the heart of the Jungle. As their supplies are running short, Lindsay volunteers to return for a fresh supply. During his absence, Duncan finds Bert, who is in a half-crazed condition, and delivers Sylvia's message to him. Bert curses Duncan for his failure to arrive sooner. Lindsay tries to locate his friends by calling them but is unsuccessful. Duncan gives up all hope of being rescued. He climbs a tree in a final effort to let Lindsay locate him and while there receives a message that Lindsay is on his way to rescue them. Duncan urges Bert to keep up his courage. Lindsay arrives and succeeds in rescuing the party, who are now on the verge of collapse. The scene shifts back to New York again where Bert is just recovering from the effects of his trip and although Sylvia nurses him she does not show any affection toward him. Dumble, Clay and Lindsay receive commissions as lieutenants. Dumble cannot understand why Duncan has not received a commission. Preparations are made for the wedding of Dumble and Phyllis. Bert goes away on business and cannot understand Sylvia's change of heart. Sylvia reminds Mrs. Stafford of her promise to Duncan and secures his commission for him but does not want Duncan to know of her part in the matter. When Bert returns he finds Clay and Lindsay thanking Sylvia for securing Duncan's commission for him. He tries to get Sylvia to make up with him but she evades him, having realized that it is Duncan she really loves. Bert informs Duncan that Sylvia has secured his commission so that she will be under no further obligation to him. Duncan refuses to accept the commission and tells Bert of his love for Sylvia and Sylvia overhears this. Duncan insists that Bert shall tell the truth in reference to getting his father intoxicated and as Bert is about to strike Duncan, Sylvia appears and cannot understand Bert's pleads with her in vain. Following the wedding of Dumble and Phyllis comes the engagement of Duncan and Sylvia, thus showing that virtue will always triumph in the end.

THE FATAL WEDDING (Three parts—Klaw & Erlanger—Biograph).—Cora Williams, an adventuress, is desperately in love with her wealthy cousin, Howard Wilson. She endeavors to captivate him but is treated with indifference. Howard is in love with Mabel and after a short courtship they are married. Cora, mad with jealousy, accepts the attentions of Robert Curtis, a man about town. Mabel and Howard have an ideal honeymoon and after their return Mabel sends Cora an invitation to call on them and Howard invites Mr. Curtis. Cora is furious but Curtis suggests that they accept and it may possibly lead to their mutual advantage. Cora displays a great deal of affection for Mabel but aside shows her hatred. Several years elapse. Mabel is devoted to her husband and their two children, Jessie and Frank. Mabel has two faithful servants in Bridget, the cook, and Toto, the butler. Cora and Curtis are invited to attend the christening of Frank. Cora greets Mabel effusively, hating her all the while. She is still madly in love with Howard and plans to separate him from Mabel. She believes that he will marry her if he is divorced and has the custody of the children.

Cora suggests her plan to Curtis and he agrees to bring about a divorce for a consideration of $20,000. Cora hands him a note in which she states she will agree to pay him $20,000 on the day she becomes Howard's wife. Curtis carefully puts the agreement away and immediately starts to form his plans to make trouble. Howard receives an important message calling him to the club, which is a subterfuge to get him out of the house. Curtis leads Mabel to believe that Howard loves his cousin Cora and that later he will state that he has urgent business at the club, merely as an excuse to meet Cora. Curtis further states that he can prove to Mabel that her husband is unfaithful. He tells her to drop her fan as they are leaving if she wishes his help. Cora tells Howard that his wife is in love with some other man and intends meeting her lover that night. After the guests depart Howard tells Mabel he must go to the club. Mabel tries to persuade him not to go and begs him to return early. Mabel gives Curtis the signal and under pretense of having forgotten something he returns to the house. He forces his way into Mabel's room and locks the door.

Cora meets Howard as he is leaving his house and tells him the letter was only a ruse to get him out of the way and that Mabel gave her lover a signal and that they probably are together now. Howard finally retraces his steps and returns home, going immediately to his wife's room and is astounded to find the door locked. He climbs through the conservatory window and enters Mabel's room. The evidence is all against Mabel and Howard denounces her. Curtis is delighted that his plan so far has worked satisfactorily. Howard brings an action against his wife and is granted a divorce and the custody of the two children. Howard arranges for his cousin Cora to manage his house for him. Bridget is discharged for impudence and when Toto learns of this he tells Cora he will leave. Mabel returns to the house to say good-by to her children. Cora is provoked at Howard for allowing Mabel to return. Mabel pleads with Howard to let her have her children. Howard makes it clear to Mabel that he will provide her with plenty of money, but he refuses absolutely to allow her to have the children. Mabel on bended knees begs him to be merciful, and Howard, afraid to trust himself longer with her, for fear that he will change his mind, leaves the house.

Mabel is desparate and explains to Bridget, who is packing to leave, that she is to be separated from her babies. Bridget suggests taking them without Howard's or Cora's consent. Mabel, with the aid of Bridget and Toto, succeeds in abducting Frank and Jessie. Curtis calls and demands money. Cora upbraids him for daring to come there and tells him that not until she is Wilson's wife will he get any money. Howard returns and discovers the children missing. He is utterly distracted and Cora immediately begins a search, realizing that unless she finds the children she can never induce Howard to marry her.

Eight years have elapsed since Mabel left her home with her two children. Bridget, now Mrs. Toto, is Mabel's best friend. Mabel makes her living by sewing and her daughter, Jessie, contributes to their support by selling papers. Cora pleads with Howard to marry her. He finally tells her that he will make her his wife immediately after he recovers his children. Cora feels that her chances are slim. She meets Curtis at a secret meeting place and tells him Howard's ultimatum. Later on Cora and Curtis see Toto on the street and believe at last they have a clue. Toto, having recognized them, rushes home to warn Mabel. Cora and Curtis discover Mabel and the children and notify Howard. Jessie and Frank, who is very ill, are taken away from Mabel and Bridget is re-engaged to care for them. Bridget tries to comfort Mabel by telling her that it will all come out all right. Cora is triumphant and Howard promises to marry her the next day. Curtis, slightly under the influence of liquor, calls, and Cora is furious at him. Toto, who accompanied the children home, hides behind portieres when Curtis enters the room. Cora asks for the written agreement and Curtis tells her that it is in his laboratory across the river. Cora refuses to give him any money till she is safely married. Toto follows Curtis from the club, discovers where the paper is kept and takes impression of the keyhole. Toto and Mabel go to Curtis's room and find agreement. Howard and Cora are ready for the wedding. Toto and Mabel arrive just in time and denounce Cora and Curtis. Curtis attempts to shoot Toto and hits Cora. Before Cora dies she confesses the plot. Mabel gives Howard the agreement which Cora made with Curtis. Howard begs Mabel's forgiveness and they are reunited, thus bringing the story to a happy ending.

plans are then sold to a foreign government, and in the midst of the terrible accusations hurled at his father, Alfred, in a fit of despondency, takes his own life rather than face the world.

INCOGNITO (Three Parts).—It is the story of a boy king named Prince Animeno, who cannot ascend the throne of Alidara until he reaches maturity. Meanwhile, a Regent named Ormuz is chosen as sovereign of the realm. From the moment of his elevation he plots to become permanent dictator and to this end solicits the aid of the unscrupulous Princess Orkanda—herself quietly scheming to become queen. Orkanda, a born strategist, assures the Regent if he will dissuade Arimeno from marrying the beautiful Princess Olga, to whom he is betrothed, and marry her instead, she will thus rightfully and legally become Queen of Alidara, and in gratitude will keep Armus in power as the recognized and permanent ruler. Armuz agrees and induces the boy king to take a sea voyage.

Princess Olga scents the plot and exposes the two. As a result, she is imprisoned by Ormus, but escapes after bribing her keepers. Fleeing to the coast, she attempts to hail the ship on which Arimeno is sailing, but her escape is discovered and she is pursued. Infuriated at the thought of their plans miscarrying him in the event of Olga notifying the king, the conspirators scheme to kill her. Olga, however, reaches a railroad and induces the officials to let her disguise herself as a fireman. Although hotly pursued by her enemies, Olga eventually arrives at a seaport and charters a launch. Passing a port she is sighted and guns trained on her. Amid a hailstorm of bullets, her frail craft is sunk, but Olga, supposed to have been killed, is rescued in the nick of time by Arimeno, who is attracted to the scene by the commotion. She relates her story and Arimeno immediately makes plans to foil the traitors. An article is published, announcing that Prince Ranko, a cousin, supposed to be lost, has been found and is returning to Alidara. Disguised as Ranko, Arimeno is lavishly entertained by the treacherous Regent. He schemes to make him king and the husband of his co-conspirator—Princess Orkanda. Airmeno, however, reveals his identity and banishes the Regent, and ascending the throne, he marries Olga.

THE PATH OF SORROW (Three Parts).—Philip Norton's life is saddened by the home-coming of his daughter Laura, a vain widow who thinks more of dress and clothes than she does of her ten-year-old son, Frank. His anguish is quite apparent, as he observes his daughter openly make love to Richard Harding, his trusted secretary. Fortunately for the banker's peace of mind, Harding receives Laura coldly and expresses his preference for Helen, a poor seamstress. Laura finds a note book that Harding dropped, and learns from it that he and Helen have secretly married.

Taking the butler into her confidence, Laura outlines a plan for revenge that will put Harding behind prison bars. A few mornings later, Norton discovers his private safe open and the contents scattered about. Suspicion points to Harding and and when a pencil inscribed with his initials is found in the room his doom is sealed. A few months later Helen dies as her baby daughter comes into the world. Fifteen years later a dramatic meeting occurs between Laura and the butler who was her accomplice in the safe robbery. The shock kills Laura who leaves a confession absolving Harding of the crime.

Meantime Harding's daughter has grown up as a pickpocket—the tool of some clever crooks. The closing scenes of "The Path of Sorrow" picture the reunion of father and daughter, her welcome into the home of Laura's son, the butler's attempt to blow up the banker's home, and for a climax the butler's confession, clearing Harding's name.

HIS FLESH AND BLOOD (Three Parts).—Ralph Bradford, a wealthy lawyer, sightseeing on horseback, loses his way and inquires at Dora's house how to return to his home. Meeting Dora, he falls in love and induces her to elope, but ashamed of the difference in their life, he marries Dora secretly and takes her to a boarding-house under an assumed name.

Two years later, one of the male boarders admires Dora's baby, but Bradford misconstrues the interest, drives Dora away and takes his son to his own home. Dora threatens a revenge that culminates a few months later in regaining her son. Bradford keenly feels the loss and determines to spend his fortune to regain him. Later, Dora at the point of death, succeeding in winning the affection of Bill Duke, a boniface, and his wife, induces Bill to raise Jack as his own son, and gives the boy his name. Bradford, to ease the pangs of remorse over the loss of his offspring, becomes guardian of Freda Fowler, and years later sends his own son, innocent of the misdemeanor for which he stood charged, to the reformatory to congregate with future criminals.

Escaping, Jack returns to his old haunts and becomes the leader of "'Smiling Jack' Duke's gang," named after himself. The gang, terrorizing the community, draws out the energies of Bradford, who has now become the district attorney to put an end to the gang and puts detectives upon the trail of the leader. Freda, having grown up under Bradford's care regarding him as her father, takes kindly to Bradford's desire to look with favor upon Herbert Hamilton, a prominent politician, whose favor Bradford courts, until she meets "Smiling Jack," whose gangsters, robbing a clergyman, were put to rout by Jack, who, taking the clergyman home, meets Freda. With them it was love at first sight. Jack, escorting Freda home, met his father but neither knew, nor did Bradford know that the man he thanked was the leader of a gang. The detective sent out to get the goods on Duke made the acquaintance of "Ferret" Smith, a habitue of the underworld, and made a deal with "Ferret" to squeal. Bradford recognized Bill Duke, one day, as the man who took away his son, and gives chase, but failed to get him. Jack, in the meantime, has become attached to Freda, and blocks the gang's scheme to kidnap Bradford. A few days later he is guest at a reception at the Bradford house when the gang learns of "Ferret's" double-cross, and hunts him down. The claws of the law closing around Jack, he confesses to Freda his identity and swears that although guiltless of the "Ferret's" death, he was guilty of other wrong-doing and was willing to take the penalty. Jack surrenders to Bradford. He is sentenced to five years at hard labor, when Bill Duke confesses to Bradford that "Smiling Jack" was his own flesh and blood. But Freda, knowing he was more sinned against than sinning, parted with Jack at the cell door with a kiss of love and told him she would wait for his release.

Best comedy in a long time.

NOTE:

EDUCATIONAL VALUE.—This term applies to pictures that are instructive in science, industry, travel, customs of people and ways of living of different classes of society past and present, staging of great classics, etc.

ARTISTIC VALUE.—This term is interpreted broadly to include the acting, the drama itself, the stage settings, artistic out-door scenes and scenery, the appropriateness of the production to the story treated, the costuming, and the absence of incongruous elements.

ENTERTAINMENT VALUE.—This term applies to all that which is entertaining or interest-holding.

MORAL EFFECT.—This applies to the moral effect of the picture either consciously or unconsciously produced. It means that the general tone of the picture makes for a good standard of morality. A picture which devotes most of its length to the picturing of criminal plans and deeds and merely punishing the criminal in the end usually cannot be considered to have a good moral effect.

AN EVENT LONG AWAITED

Read This Joyous Review Which is the Latest of Many in a Similar Strain

In "His Highness The Prince," the Great Northern Company has produced three reels of amusing comedy. It is not of the slap-stick variety at which one roars while seeing it and afterwards wonders what he had seen to amuse him. The almost continuous laughter which greeted it was of that deep, chuckling kind that spells complete enjoyment. The photography is excellent throughout, and the scenes in the railroad train are particularly realistic, while that showing the banquet room is worthy of mention. The acting of every character is so good that it is hard to pick out those who especially distinguish themselves. While the bogus prince and his "valet" are very amusing indeed, the little town councillor who is responsible for the whole affair kept the audience in peals of laughter, and the walrus-like mayor with his strange mustache added much to the scenes in which he appeared.—New York Morning Telegraph, May 17, 1914.

and the story of William Tell was the inspiration which Schiller immortalized in his drama, and which is known to every child in the civilized world. This picture version is so accurate that Schiller's words are used as sub-titles,—a fitting climax to the greatest and most artistic presentation ever conceived in motion photography. The picture is absolutely faultless in story, photography and acting.

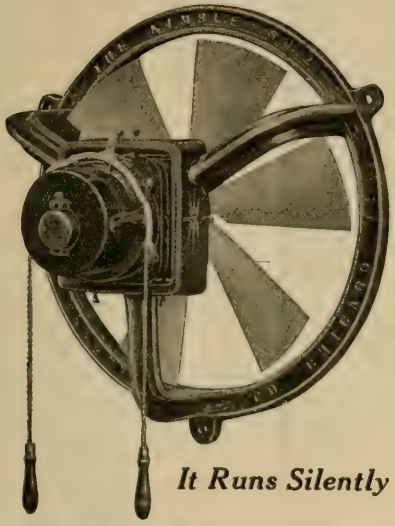
Good Ventilation
in the Summer Time

A HOT NIGHT with no breeze stirring. The ordinary little brass fan, swinging from side to side, only stirs up the hot, breath-laden air in the "movie."

But the Kimble Fan keeps pumping in the air from outside and causes it to circulate in the house. Then every once in a while you reverse it, draw out the foul air, and then, reversing it again, start pumping in good, fresh air again.

It's perfect ventilation—and it's just as good, summer or winter.



It Runs Silently

KIMBLE FANS

(Alternating Current)

The only alternating-current fans that are variable speed and reversible. The only fans of their kind that reduce electric current expense in direct proportion to every reduction in speed.

They give you perfect ventilation at the lowest possible cost. They give your house a reputation for good ventilation that will mean hundreds of dollars to you each year.

Get the facts. Write for the Red Fan Catalog

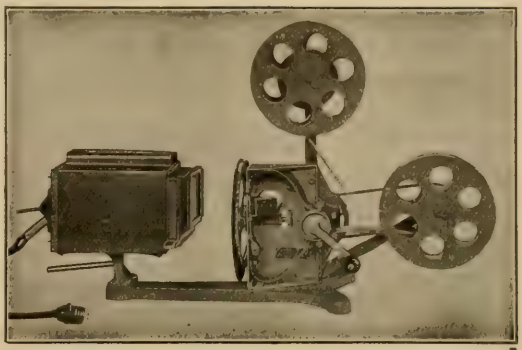
KIMBLE MOTORS



THE PHANTOSCOPE

A motion-picture projecting machine, for school-room, club-room, traveling salesmen, or for home entertainment. Its performance is a delight, and in appearance would grace any drawing-room. The Phantoscope weighs but eighteen pounds. You carry it into parlor, office or class-room, accept conditions just as you find them, and then go right ahead and give your exhibition. There is no special wiring, no preliminary preparation, no waiting. Isn't it significant that the large industrials are buying so many Phantoscopes—six, twelve, seventeen, twenty-five, and one concern has already bought fifty-one. This last order would have given any of you camera men or exchange men a nice commission, wouldn't it? Sharpen your pencil and figure how much you are missing. Then send a ten-dollar deposit and have us send you a Phantoscope C. O. D. The price is but $100 for Phantoscope, complete, in carrying case. The motor-driven Phantoscope is $125; and the big order referred to above was for motor-driven Phantoscopes.

COOLING VENTILATION HEATING

"TYPHOON BLOW-IN SYSTEM" has revolutionized the ventilating problem. You get in front of a desk fan to keep cool, not in back. Apply this common sense and blow the air in.

Don't waste money experimenting with exhaust fans.

The TYPHOON MULTIBLADE BLOWER will force air right through ordinary exhaust fans. Reversed, the air can be exhausted as well.

Our Catalogue W tells how to keep cool in summer and warm in winter.

Gentlemen:

It may please you to know that I have adopted the BIO CARBON for use in this theatre. I chose it because after experimenting with all other makes, it gave me the best results, and I am able to procure a perfect light, which is after all the most essential thing in projecting a picture.

Our throw is 170 feet and experts have told us that we have the most perfect picture in New York City.

If this letter may be of any assistance to you, you may publish it in any form you choose.

Very truly yours,

Mr. Beverly Dobbs,
Agent, Day and Night Screens, Inc.,
419 New York Block, Seattle, Wash.

Dear Sir: Having had thirteen years' experience as an operator, and for the past six years at the Clemmer Theatre, I wish to compliment you on the wonderful quality of the picture produced with your day and night screen, which was installed in the Clemmer Theatre in February. For brilliancy and stereoscopic effects combining softness and detail, we are producing the finest results I have ever seen, with fifteen less amperes than we used with former screens.

Very truly yours,

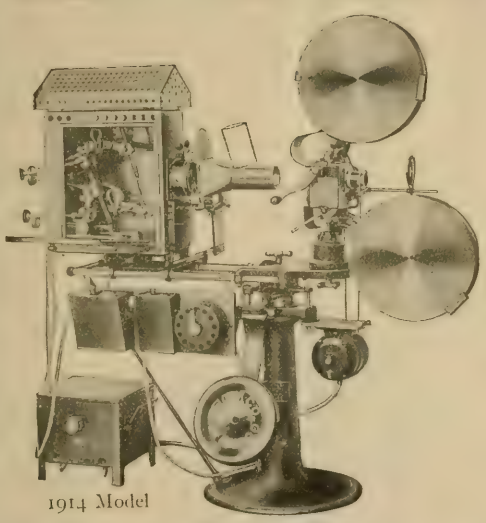
GOOD IMITATION—NOT ENOUGH



1914 Model

THE ENLIGHTENED Exhibitor today demands more. He demands a machine made of parts that will last—not such parts as brittle die cast parts, made of Zinc and Lead, so often used by manufacturers today, with the intention of increasing their repair part sales.

The 1914 MODEL MOTIOGRAPH parts are adopted and designed for the purpose of saving the Exhibitor money. Our hardened and ground tool steel star and cam will wear for a long time to come.

That's Why the Motiograph has the Longest Life and is the Best Machine Made.

Read our Guarantee. Write for Catalog.

Film Quality

Quality in the film—quality from a technical photographic standpoint is as important to the Exhibitor as is interest in the story that the film tells.

There's one film that's recognized the world over as the standard of quality—that is always used by those whose effort it is to give the Exhibitors the very best goods and the very best service—Eastman film.

And it is identifiable. Look for "Eastman" on the perforated margin.

WE BELIEVE

WE SELL you a motion picture projecting machine believing it to be the best machine [illegible].

We believe that its mechanism is perfect, that its arrangement is convenient, and that its construction embodies all that is best in safety appliances.

We believe that this machine, given fair usage, will run an indefinite length of time and will project the film properly.

We believe that if it does not do so under proper usage, there has been a failure on our part to deliver what you bought.

Therefore, we are prepared to guarantee that Power's Cameragraph No. 6A will run satisfactorily and permanently, if intelligently cared for and handled.

LIGHTNING CONDUCTOR

SIX GREAT REELS WITH 600 LAUGHS

Endorsed by Press, Public and Filmdom's severest critics as a Smashing Hit, at its premier presentation at the Comedy Theatre, New York.

THE FIRST BIG FEATURE TO CARRY A LAUGH THROUGH SIX REELS

Morning Telegraph:

Seldom, if ever, has a play been more artistically shown or more thoroughly appreciated. The scenes aroused the audience to "Ohs!" and "Ahs!" The acting was of the highest order. The theatre was packed and it looked more like the presentation of an important opera than the opening of a feature film.

Moving Picture World:

There are many charming bits of scenery in this film, and the list of the performers is a formidable one. * * * It has many really comic situations.

Motion Picture News:

A very marked success, and movie maniacs are still raving over its many novelties. It is far in advance of anything heretofore shown in this field.

An enthralling story, founded on the big, basic realities of life,—a story of ennobling impulses and faithful love, masterly in execution. Better love stories have been produced, better mysteries have been created, better stories of a woman's courage and sympathy have been presented, but probably never before has a film subject with such an interesting combination of these elements ever been produced.

The Sensation of Two Continents

Stupendous and costly film adaptation of Gerhart Hauptmann's world famous novel of the same name, in six powerful reels.

A Veritable Photo-Play Revelation

The name and fame of Gerhart Hauptmann are known the world over, alike to men of letters and lovers of the best in the field of literature. The distinguished German author is in the zenith of his literary power, and as the winner of the $40,000 prize in literature holds an enviable position in the forerank of modern authors. It was only after much persuasion that Hauptmann consented to have his story adapted for the film, and he has expressed gratification at the result.

A liberal reward will be paid for information leading to the arrest and conviction of infringers under the copyright laws.

SPECIAL NOTICE—The lithographs provided for this subject are most spectacular and elaborate and are available in various styles of one, three, six and nine sheet sizes.

ATLANTIS

The Last Word in Film Realism

Produced on a scale of magnitude in keeping with the distinguished author's graphic word picture of human emotion and peril at sea.

A Production of Unusual Power

The photo-drama follows closely the absorbing and thrilling novel which bears its name. The scenes are unfolded in sequence according to the plan of the distinguished author, and nothing has been overlooked in the matter of detail. The beholder is carried in vision to many climes, and on his journey to the New World, the leading character is a passenger on a liner which sinks in midocean amid many exciting scenes of panic and heroic rescues. This episode has been pronounced one of the most remarkable and realistic ever produced in films.

IMPORTANT NOTICE

In the MOVING PICTURE WORLD, April 11, 1914, an "Ad" was inserted wherein it said: Richard V. Spencer and Reed Heustis were responsible for all the scenarios in the Kay-Bee, Broncho, Keystone and Domino Companies. This was a mistake on our part pure and simple, as Mr. Heustis was only in the employ of the Keystone Company for a very short length of time, two or three weeks. The way that "Ad" should have been:—Scenario Department of the Kay-Bee, Broncho and Domino Companies is presided over by Thomas H. Ince, William H. Clifford and Richard V. Spencer, and Mack Sennett is the originator and author of all the great Keystone successes.

The Certainty of a Good Show

When you go to the theatre you have some idea of how good a show you are going to see because other people have seen it first,—and told you about it.

When you buy a book you have a reasonable assurance that you are going to like it because of the reputation the book has gained.

The Moving Picture play, on the other hand, has, in the past, been a gamble,—it might be good, it might be bad.

It came today, and was gone tomorrow.

Nobody could tell you about it, because by the time the other fellow had seen it, you could not see it.

Today you can be sure of a good show,—if you find the sign of the wing-èd clock in front of the house.

Every Mutual Movie doesn't pretend to be the best show ever put up, but every Mutual Movie is a good show,—good from the first flash of the first scene on the screen until the Good Night sign comes at the end.

To build up such a programme as the Mutual is ending out today has taken years of effort and hundreds of thousands of dollars in money.

But it has been worth while.

Worth while to the Mutual Company because its service is more in demand than any similar service ever has been.

Worth while to the exhibitor because his steady patronage has grown steadily greater.

Most worth while of all to the patron because now, at last, he can be sure of a good show.

Whether it be a rousing Keystone comedy, a strong Flying A drama, the sweet simplicity and smart style of "Our Mutual Girl," or one of Griffith's Reliances or Majestics, every picture that bears the sign of the wing-èd clock is an interesting, entertaining picture of the type that brings people back.

If it be a multiple reel feature like "Home, Sweet Home" or the up-to-the-minute excitement of the Mexican War, you will find the sign of the wing-èd clock standing for progressiveness in moving pictures.

And now comes the great Thanhouser production—"The Million Dollar Mystery"—by Harold MacGrath and Lloyd Lonergan,—to be released two reels a week, beginning June 22nd. Too big to talk about in part of an advertisement—

Just mentioned here as another example of Mutual Progressiveness.

If you, who read this, are an exhibitor, you know the money value in your pocket of the reputation of a good show.

If you are a patron of moving picture houses you know how far you will go out of your way to find a good show.

To both the answer is MUTUAL.

Facts and Comments

IF our friends who are so busily engaged in criticising and trying to reform motion pictures would pause for a moment and think, they might begin to realize that the motion picture of to-day and of yesterday, even in its uncensored state, has done more to advance the cause of temperance than any other single agency. Let us look at the facts for a moment or two. We know that the prohibition movement and the movement for temperance generally was at a high ebb about a quarter of a century ago. To appease a growing element of voters within their own ranks the Republican Party made great concessions to the advocates of temperance and local option. Then came a reaction, and ever since that time the cause of prohibition and of local option has been languishing. Students of political affairs have had no trouble in divining the causes of this decline. There was a deep-seated feeling in a large section of the electorate that the saloon was the poor man's club and recreation center, and that an interference with the saloon was class legislation. The late Bishop Potter, a great divine, but tolerant and enlightened, characterized the efforts of the political prohibitionists as "pharasaical." It was felt by a great majority of the voters that the time for drastic regulation or prohibition had not come.

Lately there has been a distinct revival of the agitation for temperance, as witness the progress the proposed prohibitory constitutional amendment in Congress. Local option has extended its field everywhere. Why? We do not for a moment believe that political prohibition is more acceptable to-day than it was ten or twenty or fifty years ago. The cause of temperance must advance, not by political enactment, but by education and by finding a substitute for the saloon as the poor man's club. The liquor interests to-day can count no longer upon the support of the millions who looked upon their right to drink beer or wine as part of their personal liberty. Without that support they can offer no effectual resistance to the cause of rational temperance. How has this change been brought about? Admittedly through the motion picture. As a clean, cheap entertainment, which a normal father of a family will delight to visit with his wife and children, the motion picture is in every possible aspect of the case far preferable to the saloon. Instead of hampering and persecuting an institution which achieves so much general good, our friends with reforming proclivities ought to help it and to extend the sphere of its influence.

A VALUED correspondent speaks of a revival of old pictures. He asks: "What is becoming of the old motion picture masterpieces, and what is to become of the masterpieces of to-day? * * * We certainly mourn the loss of such productions as 'The Mills of the Gods,' 'The Prisoner of Zenda' or 'Quo Vadis?'" He goes on to say that there is many a masterpiece well worth preserving among the single reels, and he deplores the fact "that such pictures must retire after a few months of usefulness." He throws out the suggestion of a "revival day in the exhibitor's weekly program." The question thus mooted by our friend is a most interesting and practical one, and has been considered by many exhibitors. Perhaps our friend is a bit pessimistic, and perhaps he is haunted by the recollection of the daily change craze. We believe he underestimates the life of a great production. As the whole trend in the industry to-day is toward quality, no doubt means will be found to preserve the greater productions beyond the lease of life of the ordinary film. "Revival days" have been by no means unusual in the past. We have known of an exchange which specialized in reprints and found it a most profitable venture.

AN esteemed contemporary in Great Britain lays stress on the fact that the so-called moving picture departments in the daily papers "are written by free lances who know nothing of the film industry, its great ramifications, its requirements, or its aims, and who, when they touch upon trade topics, betray their ignorance in a way which is calculated to make us smile." We were just on the point of writing a line on this subject when we noticed this well-put summing up in the columns of our contemporary, proving to us that the same evil exists on both sides of the water. There is, too, an apologetic tone in these departments, alternating with a howling dervish style of description. Eventually these departments will be conducted in the same rational and dignified way which characterizes other columns, such as the theatrical section, but just now it seems fashionable to "play up" the freak style.

What's in the Bottle?

By Louis Reeves Harrison.

SCENE: In gorgeous lobby of a big theater showing moving pictures. Cast: Exhibitor, a well-fed gentleman in pursuit of information. Critic, a fairly-well-fed gentleman with a cigar tipped up from one corner of his mouth and a slouch hat tipped down over his nose. Exhibitor: "Why don't you tell these producers to give us better pictures?" Critic: "Why don't you?" Exhibitor: "I thought that was your line of business." Critic: "There is another think coming to you. A few of us have been trying for years to stimulate production of what appeals to the heads and hearts of people who pay money into your box office. Yet what one of you has ever said a kindly word of appreciation of that work, or supported us in the columns of our papers?" Exhibitor: "Have a fresh cigar—a good one."

The plain truth of the matter is that neither exhibitor nor producer knows exactly what the people want. The former is necessarily biased by the demonstrations of a small but noisy part of an audience, boys who religiously applaud the flag, and honestly rejoice in the bloodiest kind of a fight, or the easily-pleased who laugh, as they do at a circus, when one or another clown stubs his toe on a pin. Some producers have a finger on the public purse rather than the public pulse, and are strongly inclined to turn out a large number of releases at a minimum of cost. Other producers have a general idea of what is wanted in the way of "fresh material," "novelty," "snap," "ginger," "originality," "punch," and so on, but these definitions do not define and it rests very largely with intelligent critics to give a clear understanding of them. And it might be just as well to consider the plight of a reviewer called upon to look at a heavily-advertised feature, whose owner says, "If you can't give me a good notice, I don't want none." No matter how intelligently honest the critic, his position, perched on the edge of a frying pan, is entirely too near "firing" for comfort.

About the only way for a critic to maintain his balance is to fearlessly tell the truth without unduly lauding or dispraising what he sees. The screen portrayal may be compared to a mechanism, an instrument of expression, more or less perfect according to methods used in its making. These methods are both intricate and fascinating. Some knowledge of them is required in order that comments may be of value, and it is not the entire purpose of a review to pass upon the process by which thought moves, to the disregard of the thought itself. Therefore the critic is obliged to go deeper. He must penetrate the ideas conveyed and determine whether they open some golden door of suggestion, whether they stir fresh ideas, whether their effect will be to ennoble or degrade, whether they kindle some splendid flame of thought or passion.

To do this requires not mere thinking, but thinking to some definite purpose. One problem continually presented to both critic and producer is that of dealing with mere novelty of situation. Attractive at first glance, especially to studio directors, novelty of situation really ranks below truth and convincingness of situation, such as rises "like spirits from the vasty deep," from a story of strong and sincere purpose. It is on this account that fearless writers succeed when half-hearted ones fail. The author who has something to say, who has some definite message in mind, can utilize any situation. The situation is only a means to an end. It is that end which leaves an impression on the minds of people gathered to watch a screen story.

Some time ago, George Tyler said that the dramatic authors of America were not only commonplace, but that there was not a spark of true genius among them—it was so printed in the Globe and Commercial by Herbert Corey. George Tyler is one of the most successful of American producers of stage plays, and he certainly has the courage of his convictions. He continues, "The press should be the great stimulus toward better things. It isn't. We do not get what we are entitled to from it. Writers do not go deep enough. Their standards are not high. They haven't the good of the game at heart." Does this apply to us? He says further, "Most so-called producers could not read a manuscript and tell what to get from it. They put their money on a gamble." One might say—well, no matter.

Moving pictures have proven a good gamble, even those of inferior quality, because the art itself is immensely popular. This popularity is not on the wane, but both buyers and people in front are more discriminating than they were, and inferior products are now affecting the attendance at small places of entertainment. It is beginning to be understood that the artistic side of the business has something to do with profitable results. Critics continue to urge the betterment of screen stories, to analyze what is being done, to offer suggestions for improvement, but what are the exhibitors doing in a matter which so directly concerns their own pockets? Their organized demand would prove far more effective than all that writers on the subject could say in a hundred years.

The advantages of an attractive package are so well known in commercial circles that arguments on that score are becoming reiteration—it is about time that we should give some attention to what it contains. Now an author who has something of value to put into his story finds the telling of it comparatively easy. As soon as he knows his subject intimately, as he might his own flesh and blood, the rest comes along without great difficulty, taking shape as if by its own volition. Any author of enough brains to illumine this or that phase of life will find his work planned for him in advance if he is unveiling motives and depicting characters in pursuit of a definite purpose. It is in writing dramas of no particular significance that the creator of them stumbles into delineation of the obvious, struggle with the superfluous and diffusion of strength among characters and events of no consequence.

The audience concentrates on what is in the bottle, on the soul of the play, hence the author's real power lies, not contriving a new incident, but in searching out the secrets of human nature and projecting them on the screen as the cause or the result of striking incidents. The audience loves beauty of interpretation. The same audience loves intensity, brilliant functioning in the evolution of characters—consistency of incident, logic in development, a combination of common sense and artistry in both conception and treatment.

People will never demand good plays to any extent. They are otherwise occupied. They will manifest approval by their attendance, and even tolerate inferior quality from good-natured faith in the art. When they are continually disappointed, they will stay away. The main cause of empty seats is an unsatisfactory performance. Do not expect more than a passive attitude from those who go to the picture show. They spend a small individual sum which is only important in aggregate and the man who gets the aggregate is the one to exhibit activity through the press and by organization for betterment of the product.

Let Us Stick to Facts

By W. Stephen Bush

NO good cause was ever advanced one inch by loose, inaccurate and misleading statements. Rev. Wilbur F. Crafts, who has taken it upon himself to regulate the motion picture industry, has declared publicly that exhibitors "must take four films and pay for them whether they use them or not." Now, every practical man knows that no exhibitor is under any such obligation. The time when the exhibitor had to take absolutely and unconditionally whatever the exchange in its wisdom saw fit to give him is largely a thing of the past. The exhibitor is free to contract for any service he desires, and he may pick his program strictly on the eclectic plan. The exhibitor who prefers what is known as the "locked-reel system" will have no trouble in getting served, and the man who wants to pick his program himself will find no difficulty in doing so. Changes from one system to the other are of daily occurrence all over the country. One exhibitor will claim that he cannot make any headway with the locked-reel system, and another exhibitor will declare that the locked-reel system is just what he needs. We are not trying to speculate as to what the final development will be as to the production of single reels and multiple reels; we are only concerned with the loose statement of a man who wants to legislate for an industry which he knows nothing about.

Another loose statement, wholly unwarranted, unjust and misleading, is Dr. Crafts' assertions that there "is no adequate supply of educational pictures." Any man who is capable of making such unfounded statements must expect to have the grain of salt added to whatever he may feel tempted to say. Dr. Crafts does not know that Pathe Freres, for instance, have a special and richly equipped educational studio in Vincennes, Paris, which is in charge of eminent scientists and the daily upkeep of which runs easily into three figures. There is also a fine educational plant in the Gaumont and the Eclair studios. These plants have been working faithfully, but they have brought no return which would be at all comparable to the outlay involved. One of the organized groups of producers has for some time maintained an educational bureau. All these competent witnesses will bear us out when we say that the response from people interested in educational pictures has been far from enthusiastic. It just about caps the climax to have a man come along and complain of a dearth of educational pictures. A well-known bureau in this city but recently sent out hundreds of circulars asking ministers and educators whether they had any trouble finding educational pictures. There was but one doubtful answer; all the other ministers and teachers replied that they knew where to get the pictures they wanted.

It is a deplorable but undeniable fact that this same man who makes such statements showing an evident ignorance of actual conditions has the ear of the national legislature, and, but for unforeseen circumstances, might have succeeded in placing his crude notions upon the Federal statute books. It has been said that the big producers are indifferent about censorship because they believe their pictures free from objectionable features and therefore immune from censorship. If such a belief really exists it is a fateful error. The action of the official censors now existing shows that there will always be arbitrary decisions based on nothing but the whims and fancies of individuals. An elderly lady in Chicago refused to pass a film because the hero or the villain or somebody fell from a height of twenty-five feet. The lady refuses to allow any plunge over fifteen feet. Another censor insisted that comedies "must have a serious purpose." A police sergeant in a town in Rhode Island declined to approve the filming of "The Scarlet Letter" because it might breed disrespect to the clergy, and another genius in brass buttons discovered that "The Merchant of Venice" could not be shown on the screen because it might offend the Jews.

We still have time to get together and fight the evil, and if an intelligent campaign based on fairness and justice is conducted with vigor and persistence, all this agitation stimulated by fanatics and busybodies and politicians will die a natural death. If the matter is allowed to go by default and the censoring mania becomes epidemic, the harm resulting to the industry cannot be calculated. Every censor board, even the very best obtainable, is no better than the plain sentiment of the public. It cannot rise higher than its source. As a matter of fact, ideal censors are scarcer than hens' teeth. The ordinary official censor board in action suggests the calm deliberation and the strict logic which is found in the ordinary psychopathic ward.

One of the troubles with this whole censorship situation consists of unwarranted assumptions upon which the boldest structures are erected. One of these unproved yet constantly reiterated assertions is the cry "We must have some kind of censorship;" "Censorship is bound to come." There are no facts to sustain such a broad and sweeping statement. On the contrary, a logical and careful mind will find considerable evidence to the contrary. We have eight and forty states in this Union. Motion pictures have been a popular amusement for the last five years at least. Perhaps I should say they have been by far the most popular form of amusement. If there existed any such crying necessity as the men of Mr. Crafts' type would have us believe, the whole country would be aflame with the demand, and the popular momentum behind the agitation would be irresistible. What are the facts? There are but two or three states where state censorship has been placed on the statute books, and everybody knows that in at least two of these states the freak legislation was due, not to any popular demand, but to political conditions.

It seems to us that under these circumstances the public may be trusted to continue its own censoring. As we have pointed out in these columns a thousand times, there is no more careful and severe censor than the exhibitor himself.

Another loose statement we would like to hit hard is the ever-recurring claim of the "evil pictures do." What about the good the pictures do? No purely human agency will ever be entirely free from faults and defects. We do not claim that the motion picture is other than the result of human work, and therefore subject to imperfections. Taking a rational standard of comparison, such as the stage or the press, we think the motion picture is free from many of the faults of both press and stage. It is at the present moment far more amenable to existing statutes than either press or stage. If we continue to entrust its morale to the sound judgment of the American public we have little cause to worry about the motion picture.

We believe it would be easy to prove that the reprehensible films have made very little money. The theaters that have a reputation for decency keep away from such things as they would from leprosy. In other words, the seal of public condemnation has been set upon these objectionable films, and what may be a temporary gain in money will in the end prove a fearful loss in prestige and reputation. Such a loss is the forerunner of destruction.

Grand Central Show Ready

New York Exposition of the Motion Picture Art and Convention of International Motion Picture Association Has All Early Earmarks of Big Success—40,000 Square Feet of Display Space Snapped Up by Representative Firms.

DETAILS of arrangement which have to do with the New York Exposition of the Motion Picture Art and annual trade convention, under the auspices of the International Motion Picture Association and the independent exhibitors of America are rapidly being completed in anticipation of the opening of the big event at Grand Central Palace, New York City, Monday, June 8th.

Charles H. Phillips,
President International Motion Picture Association.

Samuel H. Trigger, Grant W. Anson, Adolph Weiss, J. A. Koerpel, A. A. Corn, William Hilkemeier, and the other well-known New York motion picture men who have been active in the promotion of the combined show and convention for the past couple of months, announce that there is every indication that the event will surpass the successful one of last season and will establish a high-water mark for affairs of this kind which will stand for a long time.

While they are being held in conjunction with each other and under the same roof, the exposition and the convention are really separate and distinct. Of particular interest to the moving picture trade people will be helpful discussions which have been arranged for the convention. Of interest alike to these tradesmen and the public at large will be the big collection of exhibits which is being arranged for the exposition.

The exposition will be opened at 10 A. M. Monday, June 8th. Promptly at 2 o'clock on Monday afternoon, the first convention sessions will be held in the big assembly hall in the Grand Central Palace. A noteworthy announcement, too, in connection with the opening of the convention proper is that the various sessions will be opened promptly and carried out as per schedule, regardless of the number of people eligible to sit in convention who are present. This announcement has been made for the reason that moving picture people, as well as others, who have attended conventions in the past have been more or less annoyed by the disposition of managing bodies to let things take their own course. At the Monday afternoon session, the address of welcome is to be made by a New Yorker prominent in public life; choice of the individual had not been made Monday afternoon. The first trade address, on the subject of "The School and the Moving Picture Theater," by a prominent educator, is scheduled for this opening session, immediately after the organization of the convention and the appointment of Grievance and Resolutions committees. "The Church and the Moving Picture Theater," by a prominent New York clergyman, and "The Hygienics of the Picture Theater," by a member of the New York Health Department, are other important addresses scheduled for the Monday afternoon session.

H. W. Rosenthal,
Secretary International Motion Picture Association.

J. M. Rhodes,
Member Executive Board International Motion Picture Association.

The important topic of film censorship has been allotted the entire Tuesday morning session. Frederick P. Howe, of the People's Institute and the National Board of Censorship, will make the principal address on the subject.

The remainder of the convention program is as follows:

Tuesday Afternoon—"The Manufacturer and the Exhibitor," principal address by a prominent manufacturer; "The Exchange and the Exhibitor," principal address by a prominent film exchange manager; "Uniform Charges for Regular Film Service and Features"; "The Entrance of Manufacturers and Exchange Men Into the Exhibiting Business"; Report of Grievance Committee.

W. J. Sweeney,
Treasurer International Motion Picture Association.

Wednesday Morning—Report of Resolutions Committee; "The Press and Motion Pictures"; "The Poster Question in All Its Phases"; "Motion Picture Supplies."

Wednesday Afternoon—"The Effect of the Multiple Reel on the Five and Ten-Cent Show"; "The desirability and Possibility of Controlling the Length of Programs at Various Prices of Admission"; "Adverse Legislation and the Best Means of Combatting It."

Thomas Furniss,
Member Executive Board International Motion Picture Association.

Thursday Morning—"Technical Questions Pertaining to the Operation of a Picture Theater."

Thursday Afternoon—"The Establishment of a Central National Information Bureau for Exhibitors in All Parts of the Country"; "Best Method of Combining All Exhibitors of the Country Into One National Organization, and Financing of Same."

Friday Morning—"Advertising the Motion Picture Theater, Souvenirs, Country Stores, etc."; "The Exploitation of Fake Pictures by Irresponsible Exchanges and Individuals."

Friday Afternoon—Unfinished Business; Good and Welfare.

Saturday Morning and Afternoon—Unfinished Business.

At all sessions the free discussion of the various topics brought up is to be encouraged.

Promoters of the convention and exposition say that they have met with a hearty response from exhibitors throughout the country and are, therefore, confident that the gathering at the Palace on June 8th will be a representative one and one that cannot help but prove profitable to the moving picture industry. They announce that in response to their invitation to send for credential cards, upwards of 2,100 exhibitors from as far north as Toronto, Can., as far south as Texas, and as far west as Minnesota have written expressing their intention of attending. When they visited Chicago and the Middle West a week or so ago in company with the Lubin and Vitagraph photoplayers who were in attendance at the big exhibitors' ball in the Windy City, Messrs. Trigger, Korpel and Anson were assured that fully 150 people would come on from Chicago to attend the big doings in New York City, making the journey in special cars. Another representative of the convention and exposition who visited Toronto not long ago was told that twenty-one of the twenty-two people who attended the convention and exposition last year would be back again this year and would bring with them an additional score, making a large enough number to fill a special railway coach which would leave Toronto Sunday evening, June 7th. Twenty-five members of the Buffalo Exhibitors' Association have asked for credential cards, and are expected to attend the convention. Twenty-three members of the Co-operative Exhibitors', Association of Western Pennsylvania and Western New York, who are to hold their regular monthly meeting at the Hotel Martinique, New York City, Monday, June 8th, have asked for credential cards and will stay over for the convention.

Samuel H. Trigger,
President New York State Association.

B. E. Cornell,
First Vice-President New York State Association.

The International Motion Picture people call attention to the fact that this is to be the first open trade convention which has ever been held in the United States, in the interests of the moving picture industry. By an "open trade convention," they explain, is meant a convention in the interests of every individual who is legitimately interested in the industry, without regard for his co-operative affiliations, or lack of them. They point out that while the International Motion Picture Association, an organization incorporated under the laws of the state of New Jersey, stands sponsor for the convention and exposition, the independent exhibitors of America, as well as exhibitors who are affiliated with trade organizations other than the International, will be welcomed. In this respect, they say, the convention will follow the plan which has long been in use in Europe.

Eligibility to sit in the convention and enjoy its benefits is to be established by filing with the secretary of the convention authenticated information that the applicant is the owner of a moving picture theater in some part of the United States or Canada. Not until Friday or Saturday will there be any business sessions in which the vote of every attendant at the convention cannot be recorded. The annual election of officers of the International Motion Picture Association is slated for one of the late sessions.

The entertainment which has been arranged for visiting members of the convention by the committee headed by Aaron A. Corn and William Hilkemeier, gives every promise of being something which will long be remembered. Tuesday afternoon, sightseeing automobiles will take the big party from Grand Central Palace to Brighton Beach and Coney Island, leaving at 4:30 in the afternoon. There will be a clambake at the Brighton Beach Hotel and afterwards a tour of the varied amusements at Coney Island will be made, with a return to Manhattan scheduled for midnight. Wednesday evening, the visitors will be entertained with a special program arranged in conjunction with the management of the William Morris Jardin de Danse, on the New York Theater roof; there will be cabaret diversions and dancing between the numbers. Thursday evening, a chartered river steamboat will take the visitors up the Hudson by moonlight; there will be more cabaret entertainment and more dancing. Saturday will bring the distribution of souvenirs, the Screen Club Surprise, and a farewell dance. Throughout the week the various manufacturers who have studios in New York and vicinity will keep open house and will provide their own special entertainment for visiting exhibitors, in addition to demonstrating how their pictures are made.

Besides these special diversions, it may be said that many of the things which have been arranged in connection with the exposition will be in the nature of entertainment for the exhibitors. There are to be daily dancing contests in which well-known photoplayers will execute the modern society dances in competition for valuable prizes. A voting contest to determine the most popular male photoplayer and the most popular female photoplayer is also to be held; each paid admission entitling the payee to a single vote. A band in attendance at each session of the exposition will play carefully-arranged concert programs.

Of interest alike to the visiting motion picture people and the general public will be the operation of five model theaters at the exposition. These theaters, equipped with all modern devices as models to be followed by the exhibitor who is anxious to keep right up to the minute, will be at the disposal of the various manufacturing and producing firms who are represented in the exposition's displays. There will also be a model studio, similarly operated. In illustration of just how this studio and the theaters are to be used it may be said that the Kalem Company have already made 700 feet of a 1,000-foot reel of pictures and have arranged to make the remaining 300 feet at the exposition. The scenes will be staged in the model studio, the developing, printing, etc., will be done there and, subsequently — within a few hours after the last exposure has been made — the completed reel will be shown on the screen of one of the model theaters. Visitors to the exposition will, through demonstrations of this nature which are to be made by the various companies, be enabled to follow every single step of the artistic and mechanical production of the modern motion picture.

During the current week of May 25th, the exposition floor in the Palace is occupied by the Forest Products Show which closes Saturday night, May 30th. As soon as the work of removing the extensive exhibits for this show has been completed, and not later than Thursday, June 4th, the work of installing the exhibits for the Motion Picture Art Exposition will be begun. Of the 40,000 square feet of booth space available, according to the announcement of the promoters, so much has already been sold that there is every assurance that when the doors open Monday morning, June 8th, it will be upon a capacity display.

A fairly comprehensive list of the exhibitors and what they are planning to show has been prepared by The World for the convenience of prospective visitors to the exposition; it follows:

WHO THE EXHIBITORS ARE.

Vitagraph Company—BOOTH Nos. 102-103. The American Vitagraph Eagle will spread his wings over a liberal space at the Palace in benediction for all those who gather beneath them to give the Vitagraph folks the "once over" and pass the time of day. Members of the Vitagraph company of photoplayers will assist the business department in extending the glad hand of welcome and will become better acquainted with those who see them on the screen, but seldom have the opportunity of meeting them personally.

Pathé Frères—BOOTH Nos. 347-48-49-50. Various players employed in the Pathé Frères pictures will assist the Pathé business force at the exposition, meeting visitors in the well-appointed reception booth which is being fitted up. John Pelzer is to be in charge of the exhibit and will distribute advertising literature and handsome souvenirs.

Kalem Company — BOOTH Nos. 403-04. Well-known Kalem screen favorites will be in attendance to greet their friends, and representatives of the Kalem business force will strengthen the friendly ties which have already been effected between their firm and exhibitors throughout the country. Advertising literature and souvenirs will be distributed, and a number of novel little "stunts" are being kept under cover.

Biograph Company — BOOTH Nos. 405-06. With their players so widely known because of the fact that the Biograph Company was one of the earliest in the field and through the wide advertising which the company has achieved through connections made within the past year, the Biograph booth promises to be a particularly attractive one among both exhibitors and the general public. Well-known screen people will be on hand to receive their friends.

Thomas A. Edison, Inc.—BOOTH Nos. 109-110—An exhibit calculated to impress visitors with the importance of the Thomas A. Edison, Inc., Company in the motion picture field has been prepared under the supervision of the heads of various departments of the company which have to do with the presentation of photoplays. Representative Edison players will be in attendance at the exposition from time to time to hold receptions, and there will also be included as an important part of the exhibit specimens of the various projecting accessories, including the Edison Kinetoscope, which are marketed by the company. Thomas A. Edison, known as the "Grand Old Man of the Trade," will be one of the most important visitors to the exposition and will make his headquarters at the booth which is being fitted up by the concern which he founded years ago when the motion picture business was in its swaddling clothes.

Lubin Film Manufacturing Co. — BOOTH Nos. 111-112. Pop Lubin and a number of his people from Philadelphia, in attendance at the exposition, will make their headquarters at the Lubin booth. The Lubin screen players will hold receptions for the general public and Mr. Lubin and representatives of his office force will do "missionary work" among the exhibitors in the interest of the brand of the Liberty Bell.

Essanay Film Manufacturing Co.—BOOTH No. 113. Another group of visitors from out of town, in the persons of business representatives and players of the Essanay Company, of Chicago, will make their headquarters here. The screen players will meet the friends they have made through their work in the many notable productions which the Essanay Company have made within the past few months and the business force will tell their story of superior merit to the exhibitors in the trade. Because of the wide publicity which has been achieved by Francis X. Bushman and his associates through the recent Ladies' World "Hero Contest," the Essanay receptions are likely to prove especially popular. George K. Spoor, directing genius of the Essanay enterprise, will be in attendance.

Gaumont Company—BOOTH Nos. 366-67. Exhibitors and motion picture people in general who have long admired the superior products of the Gaumont Company will find representatives of the concern on hand to greet them. The cleverly prepared advertising literature which is of such value in making Gaumont service so satisfying to the public will be distributed.

George Kleine—BOOTH Nos. 401-02. Mr. Kleine himself and his associates, representing both the Chicago and the New York offices of his company, will be in attendance at the exposition. Some of the most effective and strikingly beautiful advertising matter ever prepared for use in exploiting photoplays has been made for the Kleine Company and the display which this company will find it possible to make will doubtless prove one of the most attractive in the building.

Selig Polyscope Company — BOOTH Nos. 321 and 411. Carrying the banner of the Middle West into the Exposition Hall, the Selig Polyscope have planned an attractive display which is intended to still further popularize their performers and the wares they make. Quite a company of people from the Selig studios in Chicago and representatives from the extensive Selig plant on the Pacific Coast are expected.

Famous Players Film Co.—BOOTH Nos. 104-05-06-07-08. Handsome oil paintings of many of the prominent stars under contract with the Famous Players Film Company will be used in the decorative scheme of the group of booths which this company has reserved. Many of these notables, in the flesh, will be on hand during the period of the exposition to hold receptions, among them being mentioned: Olga Nethersole, Margaret Anglin, Pauline Fredericks, Mary Pickford, Hazel Dawn, John Barrymore, Wilton Lackaye and Arnold Daly. Novel souvenirs, especially made for the occasion, are to be distributed. A. L. Lichtman, sales manager of the company, will be in charge of the exhibit.

"Faithful Until Death."

Four Parts, Eclectic.

Reviewed by W. Stephen Bush.

RARELY have I seen a picture as free from padding or even an attempt at padding as "Faithful Unto Death." This, however, would be but negative praise and fail to do this feature justice. The feature has spectacular merits of a high order. For realism in war scenes this picture has rarely been equaled and never surpassed. Magnificent as these war scenes are, and true in uniforms to the last button, the chief interest centers around a most pathetic story with a strong touch of the purely tragic.

In the days of the Franco-German war, Martineau, a French telegraph operator, is called to join the reserves.

Scene from "Faithful Unto Death" (Eclectic).

He has a devoted wife and a little girl, whom he leaves behind in bitter sorrow. The wife, herself skilled at the keys, takes the husband's position. The seat of war moves nearer to the village where the wife looks after the telegraph. In the encounters which precede the capture of the village by the Germans it happens that a young German lieutenant wounds and kills Martineau. Just before he expires the latter gives the pictures of his wife and child to the young officer. The officer keeps the two photographs and is detailed to capture the railway station, where Martineau's wife has assumed her husband's position. While in the telegraph room a shot seriously wounds the German lieutenant. He cannot be moved, and Mrs. Martineau takes care of him. The German foe is full of gratitude, and, taking the pictures of the wife and child from his breast, tells Mrs. Martineau that these tokens were given him by a French soldier whom he had mortally wounded. At this dreadful discovery the milk of human kindness in the Frenchwoman's breast turns to bitterest venom and she vows to avenge her husband. The German officer recovers and is taken to the hospital. Two German soldiers are placed in charge of the telegraph, but Mrs. Martineau is permitted to remain in the house. Her little girl makes friends with the soldiers of the enemy who good-naturedly repair her broken doll. The mother sternly calls the child away, and reveals to her the death of her father. Remembering her knowledge of telegraphy, the woman now taps the wires between the station and German headquarters. In this way she learns important military secrets which she carries to the French commander. The latter takes the Germans by surprise and inflicts a defeat with terrible loss of life. At last the Germans suspect that the wires have been tampered with; a troop of Uhlans is sent out to investigate. The woman, who has again tapped the wires, is caught in the act and tried before a court martial which condemns her to death. The little child misses her mother and learns the truth from the reluctant lips of her soldier friends. They tell her there is no hope, as only the crown prince can commute the sentence of death. The little girl is undaunted, and after many delays she succeeds in getting into the presence of the famous warrior. The scene between the big stalwart prince and the little pleading child is very affecting and is played with great skill. The pardon is granted and the girl sets off on her journey to the military post where her mother had been condemned. She hands the pardon to the officer in command. The men speak in low tones, and then turn pityingly to the girl. Though she cannot understand what they say she reads her doom on their faces. The pardon has come too late—the mother has been shot to death. It is a climax of great intensity.

The acting and the selection of the types in the play are deserving of extraordinary praise. The direction is faultless. The settings are splendid and the military parts of the picture high above the average in faithfulness to detail and in correctness of strategic movements. The little artiste who played the part of the girl cruelly orphaned by fate did very good work. The mother's part was played by Miss Henny Porten. The photography in this feature is of the best—sharp and clear throughout.

EDISON STARTS COLLEGE SCENARIO CONTESTS.

The Edison Company has inaugurated a scenario writing contest among ten of the leading universities. California, Chicago, Columbia, Cornell, Harvard, Michigan, Pennsylvania, Princeton, Wisconsin and Yale are the ones selected for this experiment. Any graduate or undergraduate is eligible to enter. A prize of one hundred dollars is offered in each university, this to be awarded before December 1, 1914. Every scenario that is accepted will be purchased at a special rate of $35 for single and split reels and $75 for two reel subjects, the hundred dollar prize being awarded in addition to the purchase price of the scenario.

This contest is prompted by the conviction that the writing of motion picture scenarios offers a distinct field to men and women of collegiate training. Recognizing that there has been a great advance in public taste in regard to motion pictures, the Edison Company has turned to what it considers to be a fertile field for new ideas, and one that has been hitherto uncultivated. If the undergraduate can be interested in the writing of scenarios during the early art of his college course, he will have a splendid opportunity to perfect himself in the technique of dramatic construction under the guidance of men who have devoted their lives to the study of the subject. In meeting men from every part of the world, in his study of literature and history, the college man who is interested in the motion picture will find an abundance of material for photoplay plots.

I. W. W.'S INVADE FORT LEE.

If Tom Terriss hadn't yelled "Three cheers for John D. Rockefeller!" as two hundred I. W. W.'s were storming the gates of the palace in one of the mob scenes of "The Chimes," being staged by Herbert Blaché at Fort Lee, the result of the battle might not have been so serious. But Mr. Terriss was looking for realism, and if a brick in the back of the neck is realism he got it.

The men, consisting of every type from long-haired, sallow-faced dreamers to fierce raw-boned huskies, were carefully costumed to suit the period in which Charles Dickens' interesting story is laid and their thoughts were far removed from the sins of their enemies. Thrice did they attack the gates, led by Mr. Terriss, but in spite of the fact that they were well armed with cudgels, rocks and blunderbusses, they failed to put enough spirit into their work to suit their directors. Finally the camera started to grind and Tom Terriss was seized with a brilliant idea at the same minute. "Three cheers for John D. Rockefeller!" shouted Terriss in a loud voice and with a snarl of hatred the mob rushed forward. Rocks that had been carelessly tossed but a minute before were thrown with a will, while cudgels and wads from guns did terrible execution. The large gates were battered down in record time, and not until doors and windows had been smashed and the house entered did the I. W. W.'s realize that they were merely acting.

"Spartacus."

Pretentious Eight-Reel Pasquali Production as Presented at the Chicago Auditorium, by George Kleine.

Reviewed by James S. McQuade.

FEATURE photodramatic subjects, such as "Quo Vadis?" "Antony and Cleopatra," "The Last Days of Pompeii," "Spartacus," and others of like character, I have become thoroughly convinced can be estimated at their true value only by viewing them often. It is impossible to review any one of them with critical intelligence after seeing a single presentation. There is so much to fill the eye at all times that, no matter how mentally and ocularly alert one may be, many fine points in the production will escape attention, so that the mental image formed of the subject as a whole retains at best only a skeletonized outline. It is only by repeated viewing that the worth or demerits can be accurately ascertained. The same reasoning can be applied to patrons of these feature subjects. Yet many people think that having seen a big pictured story once, they have the right to class it as good, bad or indifferent.

I can frankly say that "Spartacus" grew in my estimation after the second, third and fourth presentations, notwithstanding that defects were also revealed on these occasions.

The story lacks the dignity of a classic, as it is for the most part pure fiction; but the Pasquali producer has offset this in large measure by the atmosphere he has created. Several imposing exteriors show views of ancient Rome, splendid triumphal pageants, fierce gladiatorial contests in the spacious amphitheater of the Circus Maximus, and scenes of battle on the mountain side, in which the Roman legions are scattered by Spartacus and his men. The final climax also occurs in the Circus Maximus, a scene that resembles the great scene in "Quo Vadis?" where the lions are let loose on the band of Christians, only in this case Spartacus takes the place of the devoted zealots for a time, the conspirator Noricus being substituted in the end. Another fine exterior shows the descent of Spartacus and his men over lofty cliffs by means of vines, in order to attack the Romans in the rear. An impressive interior shows the great feast in the palace of Crassus, during which the consul summons picked champions among the gladiators to engage in mortal combat.

The aspect of harshness which dominates the story is softened by the love scenes between Spartacus and Narona, daughter of Crassus, and Artemon and Idamis, sister of Spartacus. These love scenes were rendered still more effective, in the presentations at the Auditorium, Chicago, by the sweetly expressive music arranged by Modest Altschuler and played by a symphony orchestra of thirty-eight pieces. Indeed, never before had I thought it possible that music could be arranged so as to afford such perfect accompaniment to pictures. Had song taken the place of the pictures, the music could not have been more appropriately expressive nor more delightfully contributory to one's pleasure. George Kleine deserves much praise for his enterprise and good taste in this matter. The presentations showed a marked step forward, and the industry has been highly benefited. When one spends $2,500 per week for music for pictures, their artistic value is well appraised.

THE CAST.

Spartacus, a prince of Thrace.....Mario Ausonia
Idamis, his sister.....Signorina Christina Ruspoli
Marcus Licinius Crassus, Roman consul..Enrico Bacci
Narona, his daughter.....Signorina Maria Gandini
Noricus, chief of the gladiators.....Luigi Mele
Artemon, sweetheart of Idamis....Verdi Giovanni

The photodramatic talent of the principals in the cast is best represented by Luigi Mele, in the part of Noricus, and by Signorina Ruspoli, in the part of Idamis. Signor Mele has a most expressive face. His intense envy and hatred for Spartacus are venomously written on his visage. Just watch the workings of his features while he stands in the consul's box, in the Circus Maximus, and gazes at Spartacus alone in the arena, awaiting the entry of the lions. Note that evil, crafty look at another time, when he catches sight of the sword and cloak of Spartacus on a chair. At that moment the plot to slay Crassus and place the crime on

Spartacus flashes through his brain. Again see him express by look the impending triumph of his villainy, when he sends by the hands of the slayer of Crassus a forged message to Spartacus, bearing the name of the man just murdered. As chief of the gladiators, as well as villain, Signor Mele sustains his part well.

Signorina Ruspoli as the sweetheart of Artemon is winsome and charming. She photographs beautifully. The scene revealing her as she reads Artemon's tablet, which conveys the intelligence that he is about to consult her brother Spartacus concerning their approaching nuptials, is one of the most appealing in the entire eight reels. Every lineament of her face shows delight and happiness and her eyes shine with rapture.

Spartacus was a difficult character to assign; since brawn and muscle were indispensable in the selection. Signor Ausonia has a well knit, powerful frame, and the play of his muscles and his strength would rival those of Sandow at his best. Witness his bending and breaking of the steel bars of the gate that imprisons his sister, Idamis. Signor Ausonia, besides, is a handsome man, with aristocratic, clean-cut features, and although he is lacking in the art of expressing emotion, he succeeds in making Spartacus a hero and a convincing lover as well.

Signorina Gandini, in the part of Narona, does not fully realize the possibilities of the character. Like Signor Ausonia, she is somewhat weak in emotional scenes, and is addicted to a sameness of gesture that mars some really good acting. This lady has an attractive face. The Artemon of Signor Giovanni is well carried, and Signor Bacci presents Crassus forcefully, although he carries too much flesh to fit the part pleasingly.

The story is laid about 73-71 B. C. Spartacus, prince of Thrace, Idamis, his sister, and Artemon, her lover, are led captives to Rome by the Roman Consul Crassus. There Spartacus and Artemon are added to the company of gladiators, and Idamis is given to the consul's daughter, Narona, as her slave. Narona, however, treats the fair captive as a sister.

Noricus, chief of the gladiators, is defeated in contest by Spartacus and nurses bitter enmity for him, especially so when his chieftainship is bestowed on the Thracian by Crassus. He spys on Spartacus, when he finds that Narona loves him, and awaits the time for revenge.

At a great feast Crassus orders Spartacus to bring before the company a number of champion gladiators to engage in deadly combat. Artemon is the sole survivor, and Crassus, intoxicated with wine, commands Spartacus to fight his friend and the lover of his sister. Spartacus refuses and calls on his fellow gladiators to free themselves, offering to be their leader.

He leads his men to the mountains, and Crassus, with his legions, encamps in a pass that hems in the gladiators. Spartacus and his force descend the cliffs by ropes formed out of vines, and rout the Roman army. Crassus is taken prisoner, but is released by Spartacus on the request of Narona.

Spartacus and Narona — Scene from "Spartacus."

Spartacus enters Rome in triumph and orders that all slaves be freed. Noricus, more envious than ever, plots the ruin of the victor. He professes friendship for Spartacus, but sows dissension in the ranks of the gladiators. Then he secures two accomplices, who slay Crassus. The sword and cloak of Spartacus are placed on the dead body and the Thracian himself, who has been decoyed to the spot by a forged message, is arrested as the slayer. Spartacus is condemned by acclamation to be thrown to the lions in the arena.

Through Idamis the fiendish plot of Noricus is discovered; Spartacus is rescued at the last moment, and throws his enemy into the arena.

BLACHE SENDS COMPANY TO MEXICAN BORDER.

Under the experienced eye of Harry Schenck, former trumpeter of Troop D, Third Cavalry; vaudeville star, motion picture actor, director and born adventurer, Herbert Blaché has forwarded a large company including Vinnie Burns, Kenneth D. Harlan and Edgar De Pauw to Fort Clark, Texas, one of the important Mexican border posts.

Director Schenck, who is armed with the scenario of a well known war correspondent novel, the title of which is being jealously guarded at present writing, will be very much at home in the territory where the scenes of the picture are laid as he spent two years at Fort Clark.

Mr. Blaché has formed a valuable connection with a cameraman now in Mexico City, who has forwarded 2700 feet of interesting war scenes to the Fort Lee studio and claims to have several hundred feet more ready for immediate shipment. This is for use in the war feature, which will also include special scenes staged at Fort Clark, in which between eight and nine thousand United States soldiers will appear.

IN his magnificent screen presentation of "My Official Wife" James Young has glorified and beautified all he has portrayed, has given dignity to melodrama through some remarkable characterizations, and has proved beyond the shadow of a doubt that the screen story can be made far more effective than that of cold print. "My Official Wife" in the original form casts its emphasis on incident, and was popular because of a pervading spirit of adventure.

Scene from "My Official Wife" (Vitagraph).

Mr. Young has carefully preserved all the spirit of the original and given new significance, not only to events, but to the entire novel. This was made possible by some fine acting of the principals, especially that of Clara Kimball Young.

To Miss Young's remarkable impersonation of Helene, a young Nihilist of lofty aspirations, of unconquerable will, of spirited rebellion against injustice, is due a very large proportion of the fascinaton of "My Official Wife." Helene is of romantic temperament, one of the types that defy domestication, yet so eternally feminine that she contains within herself all the wondrous resources of deceit, all the vacillation and mystery of her sex. Though she lures and drives men at will, she is not repellently attractive, because there seems to be hovering ever near and about her a sincerity and intensity of true passion. In pursuit of a definite purpose, Helene holds herself superior to any minor obligations of conscience. She uses every feminine weapon of artifice and cunning, yet she is pure and an exalted champion of human rights. In portraying this complicated and deeply interesting character, Clara Kimball Young has placed herself in the front rank of artistes.

Next in importance to this striking character is that of a middle-aged American, Colonel Lenox, played by Harry Morey. It is a delightfully human character and admirably impersonated. Colonel Lenox has left his real wife behind when on a visit to Russia for business purposes, and is accosted by Helene, when about to cross the border. From a combination of good nature, love of adventure and gallantry, Colonel Lenox permits Helene to travel on his passport as his wife. They are barely in Russia when his troubles begin, for the chief of police, Rogers Lytton, falls in love with the supposed Mrs. Lenox, though he is at that moment looking for the dangerous Nihilist, beautiful Helene.

The chief follows them to Saint Petersburg because of his infatuation, not in pursuit of his duties, is on hand when Lenox meets personal friends and is forced to present Helene as his wife, and contributes to the social advancement of the lovely Mrs. Lenox. There is an element of comedy in this false relation, which becomes acute when Lenox and Helene are compelled to take hotel rooms together. She makes such a charming wife at the little supper in their private apartment that Lenox, true to his sex tendencies, fluctuates between conscience and inconstancy. Still true to those tendencies, he decides in favor of inconstancy, and the scenes that follow are admirably handled. All that is amusing in the relation is brought out with no sign of indelicacy.

The adventures of Colonel Lenox, in company with a fascinating woman who is keeping up the outward appearance of being his wife, while controlling his vacillating moods in private, and his growing inclination to "take the goods that the gods provide," form the most interesting part of the story, but the serious purpose of Helene is strongly developed through a series of beautiful scenes, culminating in one of the grandest ensembles ever shown on the screen—a court ball in the presence of the Czar and Czarina.

Infinite care on the part of the director, and a full appreciation of artistic requirements on the part of the scene builder, combine to make the pictures of Russian high-life and underworld, even glimpses of barbarity to Siberian prisoners, a constant succession of interesting pictures. Mr. Young has set forth all this with a degree of skill that makes it his best product, and it justifies the most sanguine prophecies of those who have had, all along, faith in his ability.

"THE OLD ORDER CHANGETH."

The Selig Polyscope Company recently purchased from the Chicago Auditorium, something like a carload of "properties" that have been regarded among the precious possessions of that house since it was established. The purchase comprised a number of very ornate pieces of furniture, of carved and papier mache work, including bookcases, mantel trees, fireplaces, rustic furniture, sets of furniture, and all the moulds of the papier mache work that were made when the house was opened. The original property bill of this house was $10,000. Most of these "properties" will be rehabilitated at the Selig Plant in Chicago, and sent to the California Plant.

"The Double Knot"

Majestic Two-Reeler Has a Story Which Provides Unusual Opportunities for Tense Action, Rare Scenic Settings and Splendid Photography.

Reviewed by Randall M. White.

PARTICULARLY pretentious as an addition to the Mutual program of regular releases is "The Double Knot," a two-reel picture made by the Majestic company which will go forward to the exhibitors in June. It is not often that a picture is made which so admirably combines all the details of perfection which have been found to interest moving picture devotees everywhere.

Good stories are often told on the screen. Opportunities to present highly artistic scenes are often encountered. Lively action and compelling climaxes are often employed. But it is indeed infrequent that there is found such a happy combination as is at hand in "The Double Knot" where a good story in itself permits of its being handled in the way this one has been treated. It is without the suggestion that the pretty scenic effects and the lively action and stirring climax have been "dragged in by the heels," so to speak, as mere tricks of the trade.

Scene from "The Double Knot" (Majestic).

The opening scene shows the body of a young boy awash on a picturesquely beautiful shore of the ocean. One of many rocks in the picture which are as pretty as they are wicked looking has caught the little form while the angry white-capped waves, in a perfect frenzy, try to tear it free in order that they may continue their work of destruction. The lad is rescued by another youngster of about his own age and is nursed back to health and strength in the humble cabin of an old fisherman with whom the fisherman's grandson, the rescuer, has been living.

The boys become inseparable chums and at the childish request of the little waif of the sea, there is tattooed on his breast by the Old Salt a double knot, the replica of an ornamentation which had previously been placed on the little grandson. In a simple but affecting death scene, the old fisherman leaves the boys alone in the world after having exacted from them the pledge that they will befriend each other through life.

Years later, one of the boys is discovered as a prospector in the West, bidding his sweetheart in a little mountain cabin good-bye as he sets forth on a search for gold which proves to be successful. As the prospector is on his way to file his claim to the treasure which he has discovered, he is ambushed by an Indian whom he has trusted and is in possession of his secret. A master touch of the story, presented with the aid of a particularly fine photographic scene, shows the last drops of water trickling from the prospector's canteen which has been punctured by a bullet from the Indian's rifle.

The scene changes to the cabin in which the prospector's sweetheart has been left alone. Three drunken desperadoes force the door and, finding the girl, begin a quarrel over who is to secure her as his prize. In "The Girl of the Golden West" fashion, they start a card game to settle the dispute and the girl, choosing the least of the apparent evils, induces the youngest and handsomest of the three to save her from the other pair, agreeing to marry him as a reward. The pair of rough bandits are routed and the third chap comes back to claim his bride. Unwillingly she accompanies him to his cabin in the mountains where she is once more left alone while her Stone Age suitor hurries off to summon the "sky pilot."

Fainting on the desert without water, the prospector is picked up nearly dead by a Pony Express rider who takes him to the nearest dwelling for attention. It happens that the first cabin encountered is the one where the girl is sorrowfully awaiting the return of her bandit suitor with the minister who is to perform the marriage ceremony in accordance with the girl's agreement. The prospector and his sweetheart and reunited and, when left alone by the Pony Express rider, the girl tells of her terrifying experience with the bandits. Just then the young bandit returns to the cabin after having told the minister to follow him. There is a desperate struggle between the two men and the prospector, weakened by reason of his exposure on the desert, is steadily losing. The terrified girl has made her escape into another room. The bandit forces his opponent down upon a table and has raised his knife to plunge it into his opponent's breast when he is transfixed by something which he sees when the prospector's shirt is torn aside in the struggle. The knife never descends. The last scene shows the bandit outside the cabin door gazing with far-away eyes on the "double knot" tattooed upon his own breast.

This recital indicates the inherent strength of the story. In commending the picture it need only be said that no single opportunity has been overlooked by the director, the actors, and the cameraman. That there is no recognition between the prospector and the young bandit is a touch of real artistry in the direction. It is a skillful evasion of what would have been the prosaically conventional thing to do and yet an evasion with a reason in that it seems perfectly natural that the bandit foster brother would have preferred to go his way without a confession to his associate of childhood days that he had fallen to the depths which would cause him to take advantage of a girl in distress.

A possible adverse criticism might deal with the incompleted incident of the discovered gold mine. An audience that had been won by the prospector's love story might be interested in knowing whether or not he was later permitted to enjoy the fortune for which he had toiled—but, as Kipling would say with perfect reason, "that is another story." The discovered mine, while an important incident, had served its purpose in leading to a bigger and more gripping climax.

"Whom the Gods Destroy"

A Three-Reel Features Ideal in Which an Orphan Heiress Is Being Impoverished By the Wiles of Her Overseer.

Reviewed by Hanford C. Judson.

IT is said that the gods make mad those whom they want to destroy. In this three-reel Features Ideal offering, the unscrupulous upper servant of the orphan girl (played by Maria Jacobini) bids fair to filch all her estate from her; but at the end a sudden temptation to make a big haul by one grand coup is too much for him and his chief accomplice from whom he cannot hide the chance.

Scene from "Whom the Gods Destroy" (Features Ideal).

They fight like madmen with the glittering hoard at their feet, each attempting to throw the other down a well close by and by both going in together. This clears all troublous clouds from love's bright sky and leaves a flash space or two of film at the end of the reel for the happy ending of the romance.

The situation spread out before us by the opening scenes of this picture is, we think, of exceptional interest. In the development there is a pleasing romantic trend and our interest is greatly heightened by excellent character drawing. Among the human beings who are made to live before us, the old overseer, full of false counsel and guile, is the best—this part is very well acted. Other roles are not far behind it, the heroine, for instance, is natural and entirely acceptable; the sea captain uncle of the girl carries good atmosphere, although his part in the story is very slight and is also its most unconvincing part. He refuses to help the girl free herself from debts that the evil overseer strings out until she never knows when some new demand on her resources will be made. He—the uncle—then sails away on his ship, is wrecked in the Indian ocean and sends a note to her by a sailor, telling her that he is dying and that there is hidden in his garden near a well, a chest of money. This is to be unearthed with the help of directions enclosed with the note. The sailor who carries this is played with convincing naturalness. He gets drunk and confides in the friendly overseer who steals the paper with the directions on it and, after decoying his victim to the lip of a cliff, throws him into the sea.

At this point, an acceptably conventional half-wit takes a important part in the action. He has been suitably introduced in a former scene as being abused by the rough overseer and protected by the kind-hearted girl, and now seeing the murder and finding the little cylinder in which the message was carried, in a dim way feels that it concerns the girl. The note to her is in it. He cannot read and waits until the children come from school (a commendable scene) when a boy gives him the contents of it. The cousin of the girl now chances to pass and to him he shows it and they bring it to her.

The overseer has the directions to the chest near the well; but things are not all going his way. His accomplice, a rather conventional heavy rascal, has seen the murder and now looks in at the overseer's window and catches the old oaf reading the scrap of paper. He demands his part and they agree to go together by night to the place. The overseer puts the paper in his wife's box. The two villains try to steal a march on each other by getting the gold first; they meet at the well and fight till both fall in together. The overseer's kindly wife (she has not been effectively introduced) takes pity on the girl, whom she knows is in present need of money, and brings her the savings—they are in her box. The girl opening it finds the paper with the directions.

The staging—handling of the action in the scenes, backgrounds, acting and photography—is, through most of the offering, all that could be desired. Its shortcoming—which doesn't keep it from being good entertainment—is that there are undeveloped parts. For instance, we should have been told why the girl's uncle, living in the same city, hadn't known of her predicament, the more as she was reputed to be rich, and why he was unwilling to help her out of it. There are many good reasons why this might be; but since none is shown one feels a distinct hiatus in the action at the point where he come in. Taken as it is, the offering will please; for it offers plenty of good action, not too melodramatic; yet with a sufficiently conventional struggle of evil with good to be clear and exciting to the average.

WHY NOT TRY UTAH?

Gentlemen: Being a reader of your very valuable magazine and taking some interest in the moving picture game, I trust you will not think me presumptuous in offering a few remarks, together with a suggestion or two that may, at some time, be of benefit to the manufacturers.

I have recently returned from Europe, where for a period extending over some eight months, I have had many opportunities to visit the moving pictures. I may say I never lost an opportunity for most of the pictures brought me closer to home and familiar scenes and faces make one homesick. I noted in several countries there was some complaint, both from the managers of theaters and the patrons regarding scenes of America, as they called it. It seems they know California by heart. So many of our pictures being taken in Southern California, and as most of them are shown in the European countries, the people over there have grown tired of the same settings as a background to the stories shown on the screen.

Now merely as a suggestion, why not try Utah. An ideal country for the taking of pictures. A country where they have three hundred days of sunshine every year, a country where the climate is all one could ask, and the scenery is varied and extremely beautiful.

California does not compare with it in many respects, little is known of this country, as it has not been exploited as some of our states.

Salt Lake City, would be an ideal place for a studio for some enterprising firm of manufacturers, the exterior views are grand, the home beautiful, and the people hospitable. One can find anything from a mansion to an adobe, numerous canyons of wild and beautiful scenery, water falls and lakes without number.

As I stated above this is only a suggestion, in making it I wish to say, I have nothing to sell, no interests to dispose of, but I would like to see some one take advantage of this natural beauty spot, and a place that has never been worked. any information I can give to any one interested, they may command me.

Respectfully yours,

EUGENE SPOFFORD.

"The Gap of Death"

Melodrama Around a Vaudeville Sensation in Which a Man Takes a Death-Defying Leap on a Bicycle.

Reviewed by Hanford C. Judson.

ONE holds one's breath watching some daring feat of rider or acrobat at the circus, although he knows that every precaution has been taken to prevent anything from going wrong. In this picture the sensation featured is a flying leap on a bicycle. The performance begins at the top of a high incline down which the player rides at falling speed and at the bottom takes the leap over a wide gap, called "the gap of death." The length of the production is three reels and it is undeniable that the feat could have been set forth as well in a somewhat shorter story; yet this leads up to a tense moment when we watch the rider beginning the downward flight over an incline we know has been tampered with and that is almost sure to cause his death, and is, in itself, of interest. But it has not the depth of interest of true originality or greatness; yet holds because it is woven with due regard to the laws that waken and lead on human expectation; that is, it is has been made fairly dramatic. Another feature of the offering, we add, is a dance, done by Florence Mayfield with six dancing girls around her. It is called "The Dance of the Flower Spirits."

In its opening, a young lieutenant is the rescuer of a pretty actress, Florence Mayfield, whose horse has got beyond the control of its driver. We then follow him as he goes into his father's palatial house and find that his people are rich and distinguished. He has plainly fallen in love with the dancer and troubled waters are not far off. He attends the performance of her dance with three of his brother lieutenants and, in the days that follow, meets the girl not seldom. His infatuation has become so widely known that an order is sent to his colonel from headquarters to restrain the too attentive youth lest he disgrace himself and the army. This point is not strongly convincing; but since we are not told the country in which it happens, we can assume that its government was middle class and Puritanical. From this point on the action is well handled. The colonel orders the youth to his room for a week-end and makes him promise that, during that time, he will not communicate with the dancer. He gives his word of honor. The colonel and the boy's father are downstairs playing chess. The dancer has become anxious about her sweetheart, not having heard from him in days, and comes to his room, opening the window and stepping in. The lieutenant remembers his promise and is dumbfounded, but can't resist her. Now it happens that the two old men fall out over the chess-board and decide to leave the decision to the lieutenant. They, together, come to his room and find the actress there.

Several years have passed. They are married and the lieutenant is earning his living by performing in public the dangerous feat of the "Gap of Death." One of the clowns of the show takes a fancy to the wife and hands her a note professing his love. This she throws down; the husband catches it up and thereupon drubs the clown, who now desires vengeance. He tampers with the incline. There's a bad accident in which the evil clown is killed and the hero badly injured. There is then a making-up scene between the aristocratic mother and the disinherited son, and a happy ending.

"The Man in the Street"

A Three-Reel Edison Drama of Temperament Skillfully Acted and Produced.

Reviewed by Louis Reeves Harrison.

A WELL-BALANCED and interesting story relating to the theft of a play, "The Man in the Street," depicts the utter helplessness of one of those storm-tossed and buffeted human creatures, the poor author, who is finally dragged down to the depths of humiliating poverty by the very nature of his noble occupation. Bernard Shaw declares that authorship is a heartbreaking business for a poor man, and it might be said for any but a man with an established income. It requires years to perfect a first literary work of magnitude, years of devotion closely akin to deprivation, for everything is going out — time, money and energy — while nothing is coming in.

Scene from "The Man in the Street" (Edison).

Joseph Gadsden, "The Man in the Street," is in much the same position as an original scenario writer, no one wants to buy, and there are plenty mean enough to steal, mean enough to take bread and butter from those who are starving, even more for recognition than for food. This most contemptible of all forms of theft is one most widely practiced, because the victims are incapable of resistance. Gadsden looks up from the wet streets into the bright window of a bachelor apartment and sees a beckoning hand, the hand of a handsome young spendthrift who has been giving a farewell dinner with the last remnants of his patrimony.

The playwright enters and warms both the inner and the outer man. The two exchange confidences. The dramatist produces from an inner pocket all he has in the world, the script of his work, "An uncopyrighted play with no name on it." He goes to sleep. The spendthrift reads the play and discovers that it has merit. He conceives the idea of redeeming his fortunes with another's work and has a servant eject the author when the latter wakes in a stupefied condition, subsequently claiming that his servant burned the script.

The spendthrift has a pull and gets the play read by a producer, with the result that it it is rehearsed, but he is unable to replace a few lines that need revision. The required change is made by a talented young leading lady, who chances to be a former sweetheart of the true author. The author lies sick at a hospital on Blackwell's Island when visited by his former sweetheart, and, at her solicitation, recalls the lines eliminated, proving his claim to what has become a popular and profitable drama. Justice is served in the end and the villain dies by his own hand.

Such is the story. The treatment is characteristically that of Brabin. The interiors offering one pleasing harmony of form after another and the exteriors, particularly the view from Blackwell's Island Hospital, contributing to the pervading sense of artistry. The work of MacDermott, Ogle and Miss McCoy is delightful, but honors go to Duncan MacRae as the villainous spendthrift. His acting is of a high order and his personality a strong contributor to the Edison Company. The theme is not entirely new, but it is presented in such a superior fashion that it affords MacRae opportunity to show the sordidness and cowardice of coddled human nature in all its nudity. He and MacDermott will succeed in making us realize that one cannot escape from the grip of environment, that the weave of custom and habit is almost too powerful for any unsupported individual to break.

BADLY BALANCED PROGRAMS.

Dear Sir: Why should it not be possible for a large concern, such as the General Film Company, to make an effort to balance their daily releases, instead of merely throwing the films on the market just as they are received from the manufacturer, without any regard for the exhibitor whose entire daily program calls for releases of one date?

The writer has been a close observer of the film market for years, and during that time has watched the results of the various methods of distribution closely, from the time of the old "Sales Company" up to the present time. In all that time the Licensed Companies have stuck to the hard and fast rule of merely releasing the subjects on the day the manufacturer sent them around, without even considering what other subjects along similar lines might be a part of the same program.

During a recent month the General Film Company released an average of nine reels per day, including the multiple reel subjects. Six times in that month the entire quota of releases for the day were dramatic, without one subject of a lighter nature to give the program variety. Six times during that month exhibitors were compelled to use a program that consisted of dramas exclusively, and on each occasion their patrons went away with the feeling "that the pictures were good, but they must be losing their liking for moving pictures, as they were very tired after watching the program through." This complaint is often heard when the program falls this way.

On five other nights the schedule called for one reel of comedy with eight reels of drama, which is very nearly as bad as no comedy at all, for no exhibitor will use nine reels, and in using a part of the output he has no assurance that his program will include the solitary comedy. Thus on eleven nights, very nearly one half of the month, it would not be possible to absolutely count on having any comedies included in the program. On seven other nights the proportion was two reels of comedy to six reels of drama. With this percentage of comedy it might be possible to arrange two fairly well balanced shows of four reels each, but this is not possible until the exchange discards the present system of "manufacturers" as a basis for program arrangement.

On the remaining eight nights of the month the percentage of comedy was greater than the percentage of drama, in some cases as many as six reels of comedy to two reels of drama. On a few of these nights there were nearly as many dramatic subjects as there were comedies, and the careful manager could have maintained a well balanced program, but to do this he would be practically compelled to get the entire output and discard the reels he could not use. Taking the month as a whole 49 reels of comedy were released, 104 reels of drama and 21 reels of topical and educational. This shows that there was no excuse on account of lack of material, for any good manager could have made up 26 excellent, well-balanced programs with this amount of material to work with.

Another peculiar occurrence which has probably been noticed by many managers is the odd way in which releases by different manufacturers on the same day will resemble each other. Recently the writer saw five death-bed scenes, all connected with a different plot, in a program of six reels. On another occasion a program of the same length had two court-room scenes, and everybody went to jail. In a good many instances a particularly good release by one Licensed maker will be followed by one or two adaptations of the same subject by other Licensed manufacturers.

This supreme disregard for final results on the part of the greatest distributors, is largely responsible for the present chaotic condition of the film market. If the exhibitor would have some good assurance that his daily programs would always be of the same high class, and always have the space that proper selection and variety will make, he would not consider the running of outside features. If there were the market for these outside features, they would soon come their attentions and talent on turning out a number of very good programs, instead of the present wasteful system, with thousands of reels on the shelf and more thousands that will never have half the showing they deserve. No house can begin to use all the good subjects that are available at this time, and for that reason the many manufacturers will either have to stop making such a large number of subjects, or will have to be contented with the small earnings of unhealthy competition.

The remedy for the situation that confronts the General Film Company is a department that will take the subjects from the manufacturer, apportion them day by day to produce well balanced programs of four reels or more. Thus each subject would be released twice, once by the manufacturer, and once by the General Film Company, as a part of one of their programs.

The writer would appreciate any discussion or criticism which may be made on the suggestions and complaints that are registered above.

New Blood in New Programs

Hopes and Projects of the Men Who Have Joined Hands in the Name of Quality—The Paramount Picture Corporation Aims to Supply the Big Theaters—Will Assure a Sale of Their Features for the Whole World.

By W. Stephen Bush.

JUST exactly three years ago The Moving Picture World (issue of May 27, 1911) deplored the conditions then existing and ventured to couple a prophecy with its regret. We said then:

> Our pet hobby of fewer and better films bringing higher prices to the manufacturer and more money to the renter and exhibitor is apparently doomed. It seems that the feature film, which will stand a week's or a month's run in certain localities, will continue to be the exception and not the rule; for the trend is to spread out in quantity instead of to concentrate on quality. Several manufacturers both independent and licensed are making active preparations to double their output. While on the face of it this may appear as a concerted measure to hold the market, it is in reality the first step to an open market. Excess of quantity begets discrimination on the part of the consumer. Quality will then govern the demand and the "standing order" incubus will be shouldered to one side in the general scramble to obtain the product that best pleases the public.

There were many friends and students in the moving picture field who, reading these prophetic words, agreed with them in their hearts though necessity forced them to bend the knee to the inexorable present. Among these latter was a studious scholarly-looking young man, a clear thinker and a master of watchful waiting. This same young man came to New York a few weeks ago and looked about him here to discover whether the helpful constructive policy which had made a moving picture paradise out of a moving picture howling wilderness in and around California might not, with equal profit, be applied to conditions as they existed all over the country. He thinks he has solved the problem and his ship is ready to race. I am speaking of W. W. Hodkinson, the president and general manager of the Paramount Picture Corporation, of which brief mention was made in the last issue of The Moving Picture World.

When I found the president of the new corporation in his office in the World Tower Building he protested his unwillingness to talk, saying he would rather wait a year or two and then be judged by the results.

"If the results are what we expect them to be they will be the best answers to all possible questions and, if, on the other hand, we have not made good, talking will scarcely change the fact."

A solid enough argument, to be sure, but not quite pertinent in the case of a man who had a record of achievement. This defect in his argument was pointed out to Mr. Hodkinson and he was persuaded to believe that the readers of The Moving Picture World would be interested in his views of the present situation and in his forecasts of the future.

"I believe," said Mr. Hodkinson, "that this union, created in the name of quality, will assure the exhibitor of a strictly high-grade program; it will lend permanency to the exhibiting profession. I think there is no other single source from which such a continuous high-grade program may be obtained. The affiliation of these big producers will give to the men who own the best theaters in the country programs of features, the quality of which has stood the test. I don't like the word features exactly, but it will do to make my meaning clear. We do not expect that our three companies will be able to supply the entire output necessary for our purposes. We may be able to do that in time—for the present we propose to go into the open market for whatever we need in addition to our own features. We will lay the world's market, not merely the American market, under tribute, and if any of the really great productions appears in the world's market we want to make room for it in our program, pretty much regardless of cost. We may eventually designate a committee to select outside supply. The great strength of this plan lies in the fact that it assures the biggest possible return to the producer. Under our system of handling features of merit the producer will, to a very large extent, participate in the actual profits of his productions. These profits will be in proportion to his quality. Can you imagine a greater incentive to a capable and ambitious producer? You see it is in the very nature of our plan to force quality. We are organized on a basis big enough and broad enough to meet any condition in the moving picture field. We have collected valuable data from exchange men of standing and experience; we have used our own observers and investigators and we know what the requirements of the high-class exhibitor are. The greatest difficulty and the ever-present bogev of the exhibitor to-day is the unevenness and the uncertainty of production. He may get a film to-day which is fine, and next week he may receive something that is awful. He needs a continuous supply. To study out this problem of assuring such continuous supply and to solve it has been my constant effort I conquered the situation when my hands were hampered by a lack of grading facilities, and now that I have no such handicaps, but splendid aids instead, I feel certain of accomplishing my object. The large number of theaters requiring this sort of service is growing larger in proportion as we outgrow the 'daily change' and the 'nickelodeon' stage."

Mr. Hodkinson has been called the Tiffany of motion pictures. They say his two watchwords are System and Quality. The name and the mottoes fit him well.

Jesse L. Lasky, one of the new triumvirate of quality hunters and quality purveyors, shares with Hodkinson the immense advantage of youth plus experience.

"We are glad of the chance to help in the building of the road of quality. The members of the new formation will work absolutely independent of each other, and there will, I suppose, always be a friendly rivalry. We could not have a greater incentive to do our very best that is afforded by the new plan. We have just acquired the filming rights of David Belasco's past successes and of his future productions. Now I do not say that we have acquired these rights because of the union with other producers, but the union will enable us to put these productions in the hands of the right theaters and picture houses all over the country, and by virtue of our union we will be able to go the limit on the productions themselves. It is clear that we did not have the same inspiration for good work under the old system; the amount of income through the sale of our pictures on the so-called state right plan was limited and irregular. Now, we actually participate in the profits of the production and herein lies the vital point of the whole scheme. We will produce Belasco's 'The Darling of the Gods' at an early date and the entire production will be staged in Japan. The same realism which forms one of the charms of the picture in the eyes of the public will characterize our production of 'The Girl of the Golden West,' the first part of which will be enacted in the famous petrified forest of Calistoga in California. We will not confine ourselves to the Belasco productions, but will tap the comic vein with such features as 'Ready Money' and 'The Man from Home.' I think that the popularity of 'Brewster's Millions' has put us on the right track there. We have added to our regular staff an artistic director who works in harmony with the stage director, the technical man and the cameraman. It is his duty to cover the minor points competently and the minor points at times are very important indeed. This artistic director is Wilfred Buckland. We look upon the world as our market and our program will have its share of whatever there is to be had in Europe, in Australia and, indeed as I have said before, every part of the world."

In a similar strain of enthusiasm and determination spoke Adolph Zukor, the president of the Famous Players' Company. Mr. Zukor looked back upon conditions as they existed when he put his first great success on the screen, "The Prisoner of Zenda."

"Conditions then," said Mr. Zukor, "were unsatisfactory. I learned this much by keeping in touch with the men who had bought state rights on this picture. Some had no right to buy the picture at all; they lacked knowledge and experience, and it is no wonder they lost money on their venture. Even those who had both knowledge and experience did not realize what they expected, their overhead expenses eating up most, if not all, the profits. Under these conditions there was no solid basis for a high-class producer, and I felt as if my capital was jeopardized. The idea of putting out different grades of pictures we abandoned as impractical; there was not a strong enough demand for the three-reel pictures with stock companies, and only the big four and five-part productions proved successful. We have now reached a stage where film plays must be treated as other plays and not as merchandise containing so many feet. Now, under the affiliation we have formed, the manufacturer participates in the profits, and if we make a mistake, if a play is produced which does not prove a success we can call it back, relying on the bigger profits of the successful plays to even matters up. The loser will be the manufacturers if the play does not come up to expectations. We rest upon this foundation: The exhibitor and the public are only too glad to pay for what is really good. The financial returns come as a sure reward for quality. This amalgamation will secure the most efficient distribution; it will create an atmosphere like that of the stage itself. The greatest minds will eventually write for the screen. Our company will stage 'The Eternal City' in Rome itself and will have the advice and coöperation of the author. This is but one of the big things that we will do; we feel that with the certainty of returns afforded by our union we can bring all our resources to bear on the production of extraordinary films."

The office of the new corporation will be in New York. Mr. Hodkinson will be assisted in the practical work by J. D. Williams, who has won his spurs in the film arena some years ago.

They have leased 1500 head of cattle for this picture, which will be one of the best ever put on by this company. In this picture one of the rattle snakes was actually shot off the leg of the "tenderfoot."

The Balboa company is building an addition to the assembling room. Also they are putting up a building that will accommodate ten printing machines. This is the only studio west of Chicago that prints all releases where they are taken. The drying room has been added to, and a fast drying device has been made so that film can be turned out in a little over twenty minutes. They have built a separate dark room to be used in the making of stills. Another large automobile was purchased, making eight in all. One old machine will be converted into a water wagon which will be used to springle the streets near the studio. In April this company used 1,786 gallons of gasoline in its machines.

Russell E. Smith of the Mutual says that the company does not buy any scenarios under four reels. The one reel writer will have no success here. The company is busy on all kinds of pictures at the present time, and the one reelers are written by the staff. A lunch counter house has been erected in the front yard and many of the actors eat here. The studio is far from the city, and the people have to eat.

Pretty Cleo Madison was painfully burned in a scene last week. She was in a fire and although wrapped in asbestos her feet were badly burned and for a few days she could not walk. Joe Singleton also fared unluckily in a shooting scene. His face was scared by the powder which came from a gun prematurely discharged. Both of these actor folk are improving and will be able to work again shortly.

Nick Cogley, who fell and suffered a double compound fracture of the left foot, is recovering nicely. He was confined to the hospital for many weeks, and last week the doctors made an x-ray photograph, which shows plainly how the broken bones are knitting. Sidney de Grey has closed the Fred Mace offices in the Washington building and has adjourned to the studio to get busy on the producing end of the business. Much stock was sold, and hundreds of local people were interested in the new concern. At the Bosworth studios carpenters are repairing and enlarging the studio preparatory to the return of the company which is now working in the north. When Thomas H. Ince, president and general manager of the New York Motion Picture company wrote and produced "Mr. Aladdin" he certainly made a hit on "Broadway," Los Angeles. All this week the play has been showing to full and appreciative houses. The story is natural, full of truth, and the action is strong and holds the audience. Reginald Barker was the producer, and the director was Raymond West, two efficient directors at the Broncho studio. Walter Edwards played the title role and Arthur L. Jarrett played the next best part. Florence Malone and Aileen Flaven were the two principal female leads and they were supported by Fannie Midgley and a number of other studio people. Owing to this big production the picture folks have abandoned the diffusers and outdoor stages for the legitimate, and they have scored a success. Many compliments have been heaped upon Mr. Ince, and his well liked players. At the first night's performance, the house was 70 per cent. full of picture players who turned out to see their brothers and sisters in the real speaking play.

CLARKE IRVINE.

UNIVERSAL'S NEW ANIMAL MAN.

"Jerry" M. Barnes, known from coast to coast as an animal trainer, has been put in charge of the big menagerie of the Universal Film Manufacturing Company at Universal City, Cal. Mr. Barnes succeeds Dr. W. W. Kirby, who died several weeks ago from injuries received when an enraged lioness attacked and clawed him.

In addition to being one of the oldest and most capable animal tamers and trainers in the business, the new head keeper of the Universal menagerie is the hero of a score of life-or-death battles with "bad" beasts. During the 25 years that he has been an animal tamer he has been attacked and dangerously wounded many times. A few years ago he figured as the hero in the rescue of a woman lion tamer who was attacked by a lioness at Leanvenworth, Kan. At that time stories of Mr. Barnes' bravery were printed over the country.

The new Universal animal tamer is a brother of Al G. Barnes, veteran circus owner, and was in charge of the Barnes circus menagerie for several years. He will be assisted in his new duties by his wife, Mrs. Ethel Barnes, who also is prominent in circus life as an animal trainer.

CORRECTION FOR LAST WEEK'S ISSUE.

Exhibitors will kindly note the following correction in the length of the Melies production, entitled, "The Thumb Print," in advertisement on page 1204 of last week's issue. By mistake, this was given as in "three parts," whereas it should have been in "four parts."

Popular Plays and Players Co.

Notes Concerning the Men Interested—Adler in "Michael Strogoff"—the First Production.

A NEW company to enter the motion picture industry which promises to become an important factor in the feature business because of the stability of its connections, the personnel of its officers and the class of productions which it plans, is Popular Plays and Players, Inc., with offices on the eighth floor of the Mecca Building, 1600 Broadway, New York City. Its first production will be "Michael Strogoff" in five reels, featuring Jacob P. Adler, the eminent romantic actor. This and the coming features, of which the next will be Andrew Mack in "The Ragged Earl" are to be produced by the Lubin Film Manufacturing Company at its various studios on a lavish scale.

L. Lawrence Weber is the president of Popular Plays and Players, Inc.; Harry J. Cohen is the treasurer and general manager; Bobby North is a director in the company and financially interested, as is Aaron Hoffman.

Mr. Weber has long been a dominant factor in theatrical circles. He is well known as one of the ablest organizers in the field and as one of the leading producers and managers. Mr. Weber has built numerous theaters and was perhaps the greatest factor in the recrudescence of burlesque, having become interested in that business during the early days of the Columbia Amusement Company. Mr. Weber's entrance into the moving picture field will bring to the film business the genius who reorganized burlesque. His close association with prominent actors and actresses and his intimacy with the entire theatrical situation will be an additional asset to Popular Plays and Players, Inc.

Harry J. Cohen, the treasurer and general manager, is widely and favorably known in the motion picture business as an experienced film man. He is a genuine "old timer" in the business. Ten years ago, in 1904, he opened the first motion picture theater in Chicago. He was in the exhibiting end of the industry for a long time.

Mr. Cohen was associated with the General Film Company from the start. At different times he was manager of the branches in Washington, Toronto, New York, Chicago, Milwaukee and Baltimore. When the special feature department of the General Film Company was organized in July, 1913, Mr. Cohen was appointed general manager. He remained in that capacity until March, 1914, when he left to organize Popular Plays and Players, Inc. Mr. Cohen has the active supervision of the business end of the organization.

Bobby North, who is one of the directors of Popular Plays and Players, Inc., is well known in theatrical circles as one of the organizers of the Gordon North Amusement Company, one of the leading producers of the higher type of burlesque shows. This company has brought out many of the best shows on the Columbia circuit, attractions which compare favorably with the musical comedies of the legitimate stage.

For seventeen years Aaron Hoffman, who is interested in Popular Plays and Players, Inc., has been specializing in comedy, particularly of the broad kind that depends on swift action. He is the author of many of the most successful comedies on the Stair and Havlin Popular Priced Circuit and several of the best shows on the Columbia circuit. He has written numerous musical comedies, collaborated on others and is the author of almost numberless monologues and vaudeville acts.

Jacob P. Adler, the great Adler, appears in the title role of the first picture, a five-part motion pictureization of "Michael Strogoff." There are other actors named Adler, but Jacob P. Adler is the man recognized as one of the foremost romantic actors of the present day. It is the belief of those who have seen on the screen some of the scenes of the picture that Mr. Adler will achieve high reputation as a motion picture actor. His many followers know that his work on the stage has demonstrated that he is a master of facial expression and pantomime. His work in "Michael Strogoff" is awaited with much interest.

For its second release Popular Plays and Players, Inc., will present Andrew Mack, in "The Ragged Earl," one of his greatest successes. Negotiations are being made for other well known theatrical stars and successes of the speaking stages.

HITE HOOKS A DUKE.

The Duke of Manchester has gone into pictures. England's titled son appeared in a scene of "The Million Dollar Mystery" at the Thanhouser Studio last week. It was the distinguished foreigner's first view of motion picture making. He likes it. Charles J. Hite, president of the Thanhouser Company, escorted him through the studio. When the party arrived in the east building, where some of the "Mystery" scenes are being taken, Mr. Hite called Director Howell Hansel to one side and told him to put the Duke into a scene. It was no sooner said than done. Almost before the Englishman realized what was happening, Director Hansel was posing him. The Duke enjoyed it, and laughingly told Mr. Hite to "crank the camera." The visitor proved such an adept that an actual scene was taken, showing him aiding Miss La Badie, the heroine of the forthcoming serial, to escape from the machinations of the Countess Olga, Miss Marguerite Snow, and her band of conspirators.

Grace Darmond.

GRACE DARMOND, a recent acquisition to the Selig Stock Company in Chicago, who has made good in a variety of parts, in modest and meritorious fashion, is still in her teens, although she has had ten years of actual stage experience. She made her debut in the title role of "Editha's Burglar," under the direction of William Jackson. She traveled in this popular play (which, by the way, was the first drama written and presented by Augustus Thomas, now reckoned as America's most successful playwright) for two seasons. She next joined the stock company at the English Opera House in Indianapolis, where she played two seasons in every variety of part—from child to old woman. In recounting this experience, Miss Darmond remarked: "I consider my training in stock work as absolutely invaluable. It was constant change and a big spur to originality, and good hard work, I can assure you. It would be hard to name any school more difficult and exacting than that of the stock company where you change a bill every week, and are rehearsing and memorizing a new play while you are still almost getting your bearings in the medium in which you are working. It calls for continual study, much alertness and eternal vigilance. I have heard many actresses complain of the strain involved in the memorizing of roles under such conditions, but confess this was always stimulating to me. In an after experience, I played the same roles in short pieces for protracted runs, and found them most wearisome on account of their monotony."

Grace Darmond.

Miss Darmond played a whole season in a sketch by Geo. M. Cohan, and was for two years associated with J. F. Bannister's Company in "Old Lang Syne." She is simply delighted with her picture experience at the Selig plant. Up to date she has appeared in about a dozen plays prominently, and confesses that in all points they appeal to her more than the work of the theatrical stage.

GLICKMAN TO APPEAR IN "THE LAST CONCERT."

Charles J. Hite, president of the Thanhouser Film Corporation, had made it possible for Ellis F. Glickman, foremost of Jewish character actors, to be seen in silent drama. There has just been produced at the New Rochelle Studio, a photoplay by Mr. Glickman, called "The Last Concert." In this four-reel feature production teeming with heart-stirring situations, Mr. Glickman, who plays the lead, brings a touch of genuine humor, washing away the expected tear and lighting the scenes with a smile. Mr. Glickman has played more than eight hundred character parts on the speaking stage, being at one time leading man for Bertha Kalich.

"The Last Concert" is Mr. Glickman's second appearance in the silent drama, his previous story, "Repentance," having proved an unprecedented success. Miss Minnie Berlin plays opposite Mr. Glickman being supported by a strong cast headed by Nolan Gane, Thanhouser's leading juvenile actor.

Moving Picture Educator

SOME NEW ECLAIR EDUCATIONALS.

THE natural history series of films for which the Eclair Company is noted is increased by the valuable addition of several new subjects at this time. The thoroughness with which these pictures are shown is indicative of exhaustive study, great patience, and a carefulness in detail which makes them standards of authority as well as powerful agencies for the importation of knowledge.

Water Turtles.

These carnivorous animals, which are so well known to the schoolboy at play, are now taken with him into the classroom, where by a more thorough acquaintance with it he may become informed of its nature and habits. The pictures show first how advantage is taken of their gluttony to catch them with bait. The mouth when seen enlarged appears armed with strong horny jaws, which close with a vise-like clasp. Their existence is spent chiefly in wading in the waters, although their dual nature makes them seem to appreciate the land and water alike. As they breathe through the lungs they are obliged to frequently come up to the surface for air. As is well known they are covered with a hard shell which gives them a massive appearance, yet in spite of their somewhat cumbersome look they possess a certain amount of agility. Two pictures show how in the course of their climbing they are often victims of accidents through occasional falls from which they suffer no hurt, being so well protected by their natural armor. Also, that they are capable of entering into violent combat, when the possession of a dead fish is the reward of victory. It is particularly noticeable that when enlarged and seen in full detail the head, face and neck of the water turtle is far from ugly; indeed there is somewhat of an intelligent look in the eye. The boy scholar will be equally pleased with this picture as teaching him something more of that about which he already knows a little, while the naturalist will add it to his list of helpful films.

Exotic Butterflies.

After numerous attempts, French naturalists have succeeded in producing specimens of wonderful foreign butterflies. This film shows in particular the caterpillar of the Calligulia Japonica of Siam, British India. While the developments of these varied species is always similar, local or native conditions always lend sufficient interest to make each individual specimen worth close scrutiny.

This particular caterpillar is shown to find its food among the branches of the oaks, the leaves of which seem to provide a rich feast. The Metamorphosis: This caterpillar spins a wonderful cocoon which hangs from the branch of a tree; eventually this cocoon is cut open as with a pair of scissors. Inside the caterpillar is seen to be making use of the last moments of its vitality before becoming a chrysalis, to carry out any necessary repairs.

At the end of a period of time, which we are told varies with the different species, the butterfly emerges from the cocoon in which it is enshrouded as a perfect butterfly. The process of this development is exceedingly interesting. At first only seeming to possess the rudiments of wings, the body of the butterfly waits motionless while the wings develop. This transformation which in nature takes two hours is, of course, seen on the screen in a few minutes and is of intense interest; the same phenomenon is shown from various viewpoints. Now fully grown, the beautiful creature only lives to perpetuate its kind, and give pleasure to collectors. A number of beautiful specimens are shown.

Niagara Falls.

This world-wide known natural wonder has never before been so thoroughly and so beautifully pictured as in this film. At once gorgeous and majestic the great natural divide between New York and Canada is known as the greatest and most beautiful in the world. With a height of over 160 feet, the noise of the descent of the rushing and fall of the water is heard like rolling thunder at a distance of fifty miles, while the vapor arising from the abyss is visible at a distance of seventy miles. These magnificent waters are pictured from every possible viewpoint.

Beginning with the rapids above the falls both the American and Canadian sections are seen. The falls are viewed both from above and below, from every vantage point in picturesque display as well as a panorama of the whole, finishing with the rapids below the falls. The chief feature of this film, apart from the grandeur of the whole, lies in the splendid details, many are familiar with the falls as a whole, but few have or can ever see those views which are here shown; in this report the film is most commendable.

More Revelations of the Microscope.

From time to time the Eclair Company has issued films of microscopic revelation. The peculiar relationship between the microscope and the kinematograph are one of the best features of educational kinematography. Until its revelations were enlarged in living realities upon the screen the uses of the microscope were limited, now thanks to the living picture they are not only unlimited in the scope of their revealing power, but also in their teaching qualities.

To show the "dust" on a butterfly's wing is one of the first features, and simple as the first suggestion may seem, when pictured a new idea comes from the revelation, as is equally so the hairs of a bat.

For botanical purposes the section of the cup of a plant, the section of the stalk of a flower, show wonderful detail which to many seemed never to exist. The common grass of the field is seen to possess laws of natural beauty with systematic construction that make it appear almost a crime to tarmple it under foot. The work of nature is wonderful even in a blade of grass.

The thread-like algae of the marshes so often despised is now revealed as it grows rapidly while being looked at upon the screen, for it grows "while you wait;" it is thus easily seen how the malarial marsh growth is so quick. The picturing of other weeds which show how stagnant water gets its greenish color, as also the quick development of animalculae in a glass of water in which a bouquet of flowers has stood but a few days is very interesting.

The stings of insects are shown, as well as the stinging points of grasses or weeds like the nettle. Blood, human and animal, is seen in various contrasts, and the lower forms of certain life, like ants and wood-lice, are pictured and naturally described.

The beauties of crystallization is also revealed, even a drop of syrup assumes forms which are beyond the power of human manufacture and of entrancing qualities; we shall never tire of what this series may continue to produce.

Writing in the Schools.

Several years ago when the Kalem Company showed at the finish of every film the name "Kalem" in process of writing, as if written by an invisible hand upon the screen it was predicted that some day that same method would be used to teach writing in our public schools. That day has come. During the last twenty years the method of writing as taught has been changed almost as many times. We have had recently what is known as the "Palmer Method" introduced in our public schools. It now appears that the author, Mr. A. N. Palmer, is now going to use the moving picture to teach his method of so-called perfect writing. Even as "Kalem" was once written, now he begins with the name of your home town or city. In Des Moines he begins by showing how to write "West Des Moines High School" upon the blackboard. The film he uses is 300 feet in length and shows the proper writing posture of both teacher and scholar the right position for writing upon the wall, blackboard or the paper on the desk; the methods of most gracefully and easily holding the pen, pencil or chalk, together with the best and easiest letter formations.

Mr. Palmer's idea is to have these films shown in every schoolhouse everywhere. In this way a great impetus will be given to the use of the moving picture in the school. During the old method of teaching, the body of the teacher was always between some of the class and the writing, now on the screen, the fact that the invisible hand will write will be easily seen of all, and the plan argues for good success. We are especially glad because it brings nearer the day when there will be a picture machine in every school.

OBSERVATIONS

BY OUR MAN ABOUT TOWN

THE movement made by the local Feature Film Renters' Association to wipe out unfair and illegal practices on the part of tricky exhibitors deserves the heartiest support that can be given it by all interested in the business. The specific charge made by the association is that certain exhibitors operating two or more theaters rent films for one of them, but use the films in all their houses on the same night without making arrangements for that purpose with the renters from whom the films are procured; and, in many cases, the films are also sub-rented to houses in which the exhibitors have no interest.

About two weeks ago occasion was taken to pointedly refer in these columns to such practices in taking up the complaint of an exhibitor that he was a victim of oppression because the exchange had almost doubled its charge for the film service given him. The exhibitor openly boasted when making the complaint that he was really only paying half the amount the exchange thought he was paying, because the cost was split between himself and another exhibitor he allowed to use the films.

* * *

The complaining association says the exhibiting of films in more than one theater with the payment of but a single rental price strikes at the very foundation of the rental business, which is perfectly true, but the offenders do not, and will not, look at it in that light. By some mysterious process of reasoning such exhibitors hold that upon payment of a fixed price for the use of films for one or more nights they have the privilege of doing as they please with them, provided the films are returned by the time contracted for in as good condition as when received. This is the line of argument an exhibitor gave recently when the subject was under discussion: "I pay the price asked for the rental of films for a certain period. I can take those films where I please and use them, or let them remain idle. They are my property during the term of my contract and I alone am responsible for them. If I let somebody else use them and they become damaged or destroyed I am accountable to the exchange. Suppose I do allow another house to use them on the same night or nights for which I hired them? It is up to the exchange to stop the other fellow, and if they do not interfere why should I worry? It is a matter of business with me to make my service cost as little as possible. The exchange does not lose anything because I know the other fellow cannot afford to pay their price. The more houses use their films the more advertising the make of goods they handle gets. They should not worry so long as they get what they consider the films are worth while rented to me."

* * *

The exhibitor was asked if he would complain if the exchange rented a duplicate set of films to his neighbor to be used during the same period covered by his rental. He replied that such a proposition was unfair. "They would have no right to give me a program and put my neighbor in competition with me. If I pay them their price they should protect me so that I may get returns."

* * *

The protest of the Renters' Association is gratifying to many veterans in the motion picture business because it gives publicity to a condition of affairs that has existed since the rental system was first inaugurated and gives promise to bring about an endorsement of the contention the veterans made from the first, that sub-renting was unfair and illegal.

* * *

The assertion of the Renters' Association that the trickery strikes the foundation of the rental business fails to convey the full extent of the evil. Several years ago it threatened to cripple the entire business. At that time the renters did not have means, financially or otherwise, to locate and stamp out the practice. The offenders had full swing and were creating an immense amount of trouble in the business, but so shrewdly did they conduct their operations that the real sufferers were unable to account for the troubles that brought loss of business and continual strife into the field.

* * *

Exhibitors all over the country were complaining to the exchanges that films, of which they were supposed to be the sole exhibitors in certain territories on certain nights, were shown on the same night by their competitors. Time and again exhibitors who had advance bookings for certain films at advanced prices cancelled the bookings because competitors exhibited the films before the date the contracting exhibitors were to get them. The exchanges, in turn, complained to the manufacturers and they were powerless to straighten the matter out. The complaints showed there were more copies of certain subjects in use than had been manufactured. Finally, they concluded that the trouble was due to people "duping" subjects, and they so notified the exchanges, who similarly notified the exhibitors, with assurances that steps were being taken to locate the "dupers."

* * *

For a time the exhibitors were placated; but for a short time only. Some "dupers" were located and put out of business, but the complainaints saw no falling off in the competition put up against them by the tricksters. The climax came when some experienced men found that films used by the competing forces were not "dupes," but bona fide copies bearing the private marks of the original makers. There was no stemming the tide of angered sentiment on the part of the aggrieved exhibitors then. Peremptory cancellations of contracts flowed into the rental exchanges. Naturally, the consequent falling off of business made it necessary for the exchanges to cancel or reduce their orders with the manufacturers.

Now, then, let the offending exhibitors stand before the bar of public opinion and answer to the indictment that their practices were primarily responsible for the formation of the so-called motion picture trusts, so far as the operations applied to exhibitors. And they had strong allies in the bogus export agents who secured films at export prices and resold them in competition with the legitimate concerns who were obliged to pay domestic rates. When the manufacturers got together one of the first steps was to locate and attend to the sub-renters. The latter then put up the same kind of arguments that the offenders of to-day are making, but eventually they were forced to give way. It is quite true that the evil was never wiped out, but it was reduced to an extent that brought back the lost business and re-established confidence on the part of the legitimate exhibitors in the rental exchanges and manufacturers.

* * *

The immense increase during the past two years in the number of film-producing companies, and consequent multiplicity of agencies and rental exchanges, has re-opened the field for the tricky exhibitor. But few of the oldtimers are in it again. Most of them are comparatively newcomers to the exhibition line who imagine that the "circuit" and "sub-renting" schemes are original with them. It is known that many of these people have gone into the business with their plans based upon these unfair schemes. They have been heard to declare "I wouldn't go into the business if I had to depend upon one house. I have three locations," as one said, "and I can make the one set of films cover them all."

While the Feature Film Renters' Association will not have on hand the task imposed in earlier days to squelch the unfair exhibitor, still it is face to face with a proposition that no doubt many of its members did not foresee when they embarked in the business and one that they must meet quickly and decisively. It is for that reason that the writer has gone into the past performances of the corner-cutters. An effort has been made to impress upon the renters that their losses through the unfair practices are not confined to the rentals lost by the use of films in unauthorized houses. The legitimate customers are to be reckoned. If they are not protected there will be a falling off in their trade. Every unauthorized sub-renting kills the chance for the original renter to get a subject into other houses that might make direct rental. And many good houses may be swerved to other channels when they find cheaper houses putting on features that they know the places cannot afford to pay for. Suspicion at once attaches to the rental agency.

Successful handling of the problem will depend in a large measure upon the courage of the campaigners. They will be met by all sorts of intimidations and threats to boycott their products and, for a time, there may be a drop in rentals; but affairs will eventually become satisfactorily adjusted by elimination of the cheaters and demonstration to the legitimate exhibitors that their interests are being cared for. The exchange that doubled the rental price of the exhibitor who boasted that he really only paid half of what he was supposed to pay was the first to start the cleaning up. The Feature Renters' are the second in a good work. Now let all the other renters fall in line. They will have the hearty coöperation of the manufacturers, although some sub-renters do not think so. They figure that the manufacturers do not care, because one set of films used in two or more theaters in one night will wear out quicker and make sales for new sets.

Advertising for Exhibitors

Conducted by EPES WINTHROP SARGENT

Here's One Viewpoint

PERHAPS you may not think that censorship has anything to do with advertising for exhibitors. But it has. It is the most damning advertisement that can be given a house, the sort of advertising that the decent manager does not want and yet cannot avoid in part, at any rate.

Stop a moment and think just what the censorship and proposed censorships mean.

Now and then the Federal authorities arrest some publisher for a book of more than ordinary frankness in a day of startling frankness. Now and then the police authorities prohibit the presentation of some play more than ordinarily nasty in a day of general filth. Here and there a song has been suppressed because it was too vulgar, but of all the forms of entertainment in these United States, the motion picture is the single example that is regularly censored by appointed authority.

Ninety-nine out of every hundred photoplays are far more decent than the bulk of the present day stage presentation. They are more decent than many of the books now enjoying the greatest sale and of certain magazines of large circulation, and yet the photoplay alone is subject to police inspection, whether these police be the municipal uniformed force or the city or state-appointed officials.

Is it to be wondered that many persons, a very great many persons, accept the implication of excessive morality as an established fact and regard it as confirming their own uninformed belief that the pictures are viciously vile?

And who is really to blame?

Can we honestly blame the long-haired reformers who are perhaps the most active in securing these enactments?

Can we argue that from malice and all uncharitableness they have, without provocation, put this stigma on the business?

Or would it not be better to admit that we of this business, or certain of us, are the ones directly responsible for having placed in the hands of the reformers the arguments that have been used?

The men of the motion picture business are the ones who are primarily to blame for the state and local censorships and the proposed broad Federal legislation.

And please understand that nothing whatever in this article has in the least an open or secret bearing upon the state of affairs in Ohio. This has to deal with the entire country and not with any state or city. This is not a pre-convention argument for or against Mr. Neff and we had gotten this far with the article before we realized that it might be so construed, hence this disclaimer. The matter is bigger than the state of Ohio, larger than any particular section of the country. Mr. Neff had nothing whatever to do with the proposed New Jersey censorship, and has nothing to do with the proposed Federal action, and this article deals solely with nation-wide conditions. Please keep this fact clearly in mind.

Nor is this article primarily to argue for or against censorship. It is merely to point out that if we have censorship it is because the motion picture business is to blame.

The Causes

The reason why there are censorships is because the limits of decency have been exceeded. They have been exceeded, very often, by those who now declaim most loudly against the unconstitutional restraint, just as the small boy who munches unripe fruit blames his colic on the green apple and not on the fact that he eat it. Some months ago an Ohio exhibitor wrote that what he had to say about White Slave pictures might be all right, but that one of these subjects was at the moment making more money for him than any title he had ever had in his house. We wonder how loudly he is raising his voice right now against the censorship, and yet these slaver pictures were one of the most potent arguments in favor of censorship not alone in Ohio, but in every part of the country. If he does not like the censorship he has himself and others like him—to blame. And it is not alone the manager who offends who gets the blame, but the just and the unjust suffer alike.

Take ten men sitting on a bench, all perfectly quiet. They attract no particular attention. Let one of these men utter a shout and at once he attracts attention to them all. Nine of the men are still silent. The people all look at the tenth man and mentally comment that the ten are a bunch of rowdies. All get blamed for the single offense. The scores of decent minded, self respecting men, with a proper regard for their business reputation; men who would not, for business reasons if none other, offer the salacious and offensive, are all blamed for the actions of those who do give offense by using immoral plays or by seeking to create the suggestion that what they offer is immoral whether it is or not.

Last week, in front of a prominent New York house was a one sheet carrying this impressive literary effort:

Anguish swept her soul with a devastating flood of frantic feeling. Upon the lips of the tightrope dancer, she saw her husband pressing the carnal kiss.

That's a pretty little line to back up a soul-kiss lithograph, isn't it? Would you want your young daughters to line up in front of that poster and wonder what a carnal kiss was and perhaps go home and look it up in the dictionary?

If you had the unfortunate mental makeup that led you to desire to make all others as pure in soul as you thought yourself to be, wouldn't you hustle home and start a censorship movement? It does not matter that the play this paper advertises is not as red as it is painted. It is sufficient that this sewer-brained effusion is pasted in front of the house, presumably as an indication of what is to be seen within. It is not only in pictures that the lithograph is the most objectionable feature of production, but that is beside the point. The point is that exhibitors use this paper. It is but logical to argue that they use it for no other purpose than to appeal to the public with the suggestion that the play to be seen within is wickedly immoral. The manager goes on record as wishing to cater to the taste of the vicious and depraved. It would be possible to film Uncle Tom's Cabin and give all of the paper to the hankering of Legree for Cassie while the film gave this merely as incidental, but the effect on the man who saw the paper and not the play is what counts, not what the play really is.

Can that manager complain if, in the interests of common decency, some legal check is placed upon his pandermings to the lowest, filthiest, most debased creatures?

When a stage play offends, the police take action. They suppress the single presentation and the evil is abated. The film if too ubiquitous to permit individual action in the case of each offender. The film that is stopped to-day in one theater is exhibited to-morrow in another and in still another the third day. Censorship is a blanket movement, suppressing the play completely within the jurisdiction of the censors. And it must be remembered that where a season may not bring forward three hundred stage plays, that many subjects are less than a month's production of the studios.

And the Manufacturer

And so we come to the manufacturer. If no filthy plays were made, none could be sold. On the other hand, if none could be sold, none would be made, and so back the blame comes to the exhibitor, who in turn blames it on his public. It cannot be denied that at bottom a certain section of the public is as much to blame as is the manager for catering to the demand or the manufacturer for supplying it. But if the manager caters to the demand he should be willing to submit to the consequences just as the keeper of a disorderly house expects to go to jail if his "pull" does not prevail against the efforts of the reformer.

The trouble with the censorship is that it gives all pictures and all theaters the same unpleasant notoriety that should accrue only to the offenders. If the censorship operated only against those who are really to blame, there could exist not the slightest objection to such supervision, and the decent managers would be the first to welcome this restraining influence.

But the stigma of censorship applies to all houses, and for the greater part these censorships are hopelessly, impossibly idiotic in their administration. One censoring official has been quoted as saying that the Keystone police force is supremely funny. Another official, a member of another censorship board, declares that the Keystone Kops are vicious in that these farces engender a contempt for the uniform. Both cannot be right, perhaps both are wrong, but who shall decide where censors disagree? Wherein do they differ from other men and women with personal likes and dislikes? That is the vicious part of the censorship. Thousands, perhaps millions of persons must submit to having forced upon them the likes and dislikes of three to seven men and women who are notable for the peculiar kinks in their modes of thought. Where the various forms of graft are absent, the most abhorent feature of the censorship is the gross incompetency of its administration.

Back to the Point

But we are wandering from the direct argument, which is this: If we suffer from a censorship, we have only our own associates to blame. The original censorship, the National Board, was not formed by fanatical reformers to bear down the business. It was organized to prevent the formation of the more dreaded local police censorship. Fifty per cent of the agitation was caused by the films and the rest was due to the lurid paper; not all of which in those days was made expressly for the films, but was taken from the stocks on the lithographers' shelves, the advertising matter of defunct melodramas.

If there were no vicious films, no misleading lithographs and other advertising matter, there would be no need of censorship, but the dog has been given a bad name and he may yet be hanged.

But even if there does exist a class of improper pictures or pictures advertised with improper paper, it does not follow that the manager must use this material. There are far too many splendid productions for it to be argued that a manager must take what is given him or nothing at all. He does not have to make his bid for trade with "The Bull Dogs of the Bowery." He can run the product of the companies that make clean and decent stuff. The Selig production of "The Spoilers" is just as startling as "The Slave of Sin," it will bring more money in proportion to the investment in rental, and it is cleanly done. There are some sensational scenes in the production, stuff that will not appeal to those who see evil in all, but it is cleanly, artistically done, and the offense of filth lies in its grossness rather than in the fact. If it is nudity you desire there are many films in which the players are stripped almost to absolute nakedness, and yet the artistic charm of the production rises superior to the fact of nudity. It is not argued that all photoplays must adhere to the standards that would be approved by Little Lord and his smaller sister, but that what is done shall be done so well that no offense is given. And in the last reduction the manager who deliberately caters to all that is evil has no excuse. There is better, cleaner film: material that would bring him in greater returns if only he knew how to use it. Since he willfully offends, it should be the part of the various organizations of exhibitors to endeavor to hold him in check. It is through the exhibitors' associations that the censorships may be avoided, not through legal fights against the establishment of censorships, but by appeals to public opinion which render them unnecessary.

More than once this department has shown how local censorships have either been avoided or overthrown. If each exhibitor would pledge himself not to use vicious subjects, but to return them to the exchange with a demand for a rebate; if the exchanges could be prevailed upon to refuse to take from the manufacturer the offensive material, there would quickly come about a new order. From every point of view it seems to be up to the exhibitor, as an individual and in association.

And Sensation

And too much sensation is almost as bad as immorality since it creates a bad impression. You cannot hold it down to a single standard. There is bound to come a time when the demand for sensation is above the supply. The man of simple tastes is content with beefsteak year after year. The clubman turns to Worcestershire, then to tobasco and in the end even that loses its savor and leaves him with a jaded palate that may be appealed to only through conning combinations of condiments. Cater to the standard demand and your business will remain standard, but give heed to the growing insistence for greater sensation and you'll find the time arrive when you lose your patrons because sensation is exhausted.

Think all this over before you go to the convention and when you get there talk about it.

Good News

We have repeatedly spoken of the excellent work done by the Moving Picture Sales Agency of London in providing its clients with good advertising matter far the subjects it handles. B. Nicholls is an expert when it comes to getting out advertising matter as well as in selling films, and now much of this material will be available to the American managers through the establishment of the Cosmofotofilm Company here under the management of Paul H. Cromelin, which is virtually the American branch of the Nicholls enterprise. The special subjects released through the Cosmofotofilm are plentifully supplied with real advertising material as Mr. Cromelin recently demonstrated. The booklet for the London Film Company's "The House of Temperley," which is the first example of the New York production, is capitally done both in text and illustration.

Cut Copy

Will those friends who are good enough to send in photographs of their advertising displays, be good enough to add to our indebtedness by getting them to us in reproducible shape. It may be a more simple matter to roll an unmounted photograph in a newspaper and send it in that way instead of chasing down to the stationer's and buying a photomailer, but it is impracticable to make a halftone from a creased picture. Time and again pictures go into the waste basket because they are ruined in the mails, and others find the same resting place because they are not accompanied by description of any sort. We are always glad to receive and reproduce photographs of advertising displays, but we like to know the name of the theater, the town it is in, the cost of the display, if it is some special stunt, and any other detail that might be helpful to others.

Playing Wide.

The Picture News, of Shreveport, La., one of the Saenger enterprises, is now made to cover the theaters of Shreveport and Monroe, La., and Texarkana, Texas; eight houses in all. Texarkana is about seventy miles in an airline northwest from Shreveport and Monroe about ninety-five miles to the east, but there are school and other notes from all three cities, and the sheet really has a place above the average program. This is our idea of an effective program; something that will be read for itself and so carry the advertising into the home. There is some house stuff, some photoplay stuff, a department for photoplay writers, general news and feature news. The last issue features, among other pictures, the Universal's "Samson." The best line in the latter advertising appears under the Samson "seal" and reads, "Ask your Sunday-school teacher about Samson." It's a good line for others to use, with or without the seal.

Thinking Alike.

Lately we told of the due bill "Paid in Full" that caused a lot of people in a California town to regard it as a pass and now come Hay & Nicholas with a check on the "regional bank" provided by President Wilson and his son-in-law, only this is a slight paraphrase which reads:

BANK OF LAUGHTER, FUN AND GOOD CHEER
FAIRMONT REGIONAL BRANCH

On Demand
Pay to the order of (Name of recipient here.)
ONE FIRST CLASS SHOW Payable at

No. 14?.

Hay & Nicholas
Local Managers
(HANNIC THEATER.)

And they write:

The enclosed form of free pass is, so far as we are aware, original with us. We propose to use it to start our new serial pictures right. We are mailing a large number of them this week for the first installment of "Dolly of the Dailies." Next week we go up against a circus with a two-part circus picture, and for that occasion we shall mail one of these passes to the owner of every automobile within a radius of twenty miles.

By the way, the automobile mailing list is a real asset, and it doesn't cost much to get it. You can get the name and postoffice address of every car owner in the county by consulting the assessment books at the court house, and after that it is simply a matter of getting the local dealers to supply the names of subsequent purchasers.

We figure that most of the auto owners will be in town on circus day, and that if they use their pass on the show they won't come alone.

Tell us what you think of the scheme?

We inclose photos showing a part of the billing we did for Edison's talking pictures. You will notice that the stencil letters worked in nicely on the bottom of one of the billboards.

And you'll note that this is really a pass where the other was not. It is gotten out as carefully as a real check would be and filled in with pen and ink to the recipient.

But more important is this tip of theirs about the auto mailing list. In summer, particularly, the auto hurts business. Try and make your house the objective point of the auto trip. Make it help instead of hurt, and you'll have cause to rise up and call Hay & Nicholas blessed as others have done before you. It's one of the best ideas recently advanced in this department. They are two mighty adept managers, these men from Fairmount, and you can safely follow their lead.

This cut shows what they did in the way of billing the Edison talking pictures. But one of the photographs can be reproduced here and that is not the one that uses the De Subers stencil letters referred to, which reminds us that it is to an inquiry from Hay & Nicholas that you who have them owe the cheap and effective stencils and all of you the de Subers catchlines. And this reminds us again that Mr. De Subers has gone into one of his Philadelphia slumbers. Will he please regulate the alarm clock?

Still More.

We spoke recently of Mr. Van Riper's over informative card filing system. He gives the logical answer that the space for the cameraman's name if provided particularly for the big educational and travel pictures, such, for instance, as the films from Homer Croy that will presently be released by the Universal. By the same token these are going to be a most unusual set of travel pictures; a wholly new idea.

Anyhow, Mr. Van Riper adds:

I find that it is the personal end of the business that interests my patrons. In addition to the card sent you, I have a card system supplemented by an envelope filling system, that keeps me posted about everyone of interest to my patrons that is in the moving picture business. I find this information of great value in making up my "Weekly."

The general idea which I try to follow in my advertising is that the people are interested first in their own comfort and entertainment; second, "getting their money's worth." My theater is just the thing to give them this. My theater is the thing I advertise first, last and all the time.

This is what we have been telling you for the past couple of years, but it will stand retelling. The big appeal is not the film company, but the film players. Be prepared to tell the fans about the players. The envelope filing system is good.

If we had a theater with plenty of room, we would have a reading room with all the trade and semi-trade papers and magazines and we would have a bulletin board for the latest news and photographs of all the players we could get hold of, particularly those in the films we used, and give out the Kraus postcards and do all else we could to encourage people to be interested in the screen stars and star dust. Make people interested in the players and you get something that lasts. It's not always easy to interest them in some of the plays.

Can It Be?

John Filan, who describes himself as the "Mechanic on program," sends the issues of the Nassau Theater, of Port Washington, Long Island. He adds the house seats 600 and runs mostly pictures except when they have road shows. We'll leave it to John Coleman if road shows of the real sort ever get that far out Long Island.

Mr. Filan gets out a good program, an eight-page issue that looks more like New York than Long Island. (Yes, we live on Long Island, but we can't help it.) The reading matter is either well written or well selected, and there is some of both. The program at first appeared on the two center pages, but they now are run on two right hand pages, which is much better. It the house lives up to the program it's a mighty broad gauge and interesting place. Right from the jump they got a good line of advertising and they are giving the advertiser a sheet that will be taken home and read through. It's a good production. Here is a suggestion that may appeal to others:

FIRE NOTICE.

Look around NOW and choose the nearest Exit to your seat. In case of fire walk (not run) to THAT exit. Do not try to beat your neighbor to the street.

THE PHOTOPLAYWRIGHT

Conducted by EPES WINTHROP SARGENT

Not Altogether That

NOW and then—and sometimes more often—we get scrapping by mail with Roy McCardell. He's an old friend and deskmate and he is just the same chap now he used to be when we'd take his "Sunday stuff" and tell him we knew there was a libel suit in it, and generally there was, not later than Tuesday morning.

Lately he had an article in the Saturday Evening Post and he made the same argument that the photoplay game was only for the experienced writer who had found success in the magazines or in newspaper work, so we fired a shot his way and ducked. This is part of what we ducked:

> I left out some good men inadvertently, but had I printed all that deserved mention I would only have further proved my case that it takes a good writer to write good photoplays. Not necessarily a college man, it may be a self-made student, such as in the world of letters came from the plough in the case of Burns, and from the tinker's kit in the case of Bunyan. The preponderance of bad and stupid pictures is due to the stupid people who have control of picture production in many studios, wholly or in part. These people, in many cases, can do as they please with pictures—I am speaking of manufacturers, directors and scenario editors. I see, however, a better time at hand when there will be no more ignorantly conducted picture factories any more than there are any ignorantly conducted newspapers or periodicals of any consequence. The Laura Jean Libby era in pictures is passing just as her era passed in fiction, and in the "Bertha, the Sewing Machine Girl," defunct school of drama. You may think that your department is of consequence to tyros and aspirants—it is to those who have the goods and need encouragement—but their ratio has been fixed by Frank Woods' damning statistics—one in a thousand! Your department in the Moving Picture World is really the friend, philosopher and guide of those who can and do write good moving pictures and who wish to and will write better ones. Even you can give no help to the helpless, although you may give hope to the hopeless. Of course, your department is very popular and very valuable to your paper, more for the last reason than the former, because it is read by those who can and those who never will equally and alike—and the latter outnumber the former as one in a thousand. Take my case: I have been getting up picture ideas, singly and in series, serious and humorous, for Puck and the comic supplements and other periodicals for nearly 30 years—since I was 13. And I have been writing moving pictures for 14 years and I am realizing that I am just learning how. And you will understand that I am equipped with a temperament for creation, a memory that is a storehouse for most of the things I have read, and I have read almost every good thing that was ever printed. I am very anxious to go abroad late this summer and study moving pictures in the great foreign studios—and I wish some of the leading manufacturers of America could go with me.
> I noted your remarks about doubting my selling by synopsis. You are correct in a measure, but I have often sent a synopsis and asked for an order for complete working script on it before I went ahead with the working scenario. I did this, because I take such infinite descriptive pains with my complete scenarios that it is only fair I should have an order for them before I go to all the pains I do. Frankly, it does not pay me to write scenarios at $50 per reel now, no more than it paid me to write them for $5, $10 and $20 in the past. But I have cheerfully written them to the best of my ability for whatever was the market price, because I felt that I could do them better than the untrained, unfitted people to whom these prices were more than generous, when the poor quality of their work was considered. I believe that many of the leading writers of to-day felt and feel as I do in the matter. One thing I cannot understand is that many of the leading manufacturers who grew rich on pictures, turned out at the time "when everything went," do not realize that those times are over and that the majority of their product is stupid, ignorant, silly and false. They have now to deal with a preponderance of people whose tastes are advanced, who know the good from the bad and the false from the true. But these very manufacturers seem to think the moving picture audiences "do not know what they want," and that what they, the manufacturers, turn out is plenty good enough. These manufacturers, instead of welcoming suggestions and criticisms from those who mean well and who have the welfare of moving pictures at heart, are impatient at suggestion and are intolerant of constructive criticism.
> I look forward, however, to greatly improved conditions in all these things. Many significant portents encourage me to say this.
> I am doing very little moving picture work, except what I have orders for. The orders are constantly increasing, and in several cases I have what is practically a guarantee. I am not sending out many synopses, as I find I can sell practically all the scenarios I do. I agree with you that the real scenario writer should write a real scenario, with every detail of incident, characterization, scenes and props carefully laid out. So far as selling from a mere outline synopsis, I do not think that fair to either myself or the New Art. If I simply wished to make money out of moving pictures I would write synopses only. I firmly believe I could furnish at least four, if not more, synopses or outline plots for moving pictures, one reel or more, every day of my life. But I wish to take the pains with and have the pride in my moving pictures as much as I do with my magazine or other literary labors; and conceiving plots and selling plots alone, simply for the easy money, would not make a good moving picture author out of me, and that is what I desire to be. Owing to the cost of white paper, newspapers and magazines can progress but little, and the stage, too, is about as far as it can go. But in moving pictures, I feel sure that we are but upon the threshold of wonderful things we are going to do!

We are giving Mr. McCardell's views at some length because the views of a man who has done as much good work as he has commands attention. In the Jarr series alone, he stands unique in keeping the stories up to standard six days a week year after year, but we are not at all fours with him on that proposition that the entrance to photoplay is through the magazine or the newspaper.

And we do not agree with him that we bring help only to one in a thousand and otherwise merely bring help to the helpless. If we believed that to be true, we would have abandoned this department a long time ago. We could make more money if we did not write this department quite apart from the correspondence that this department entails. It is not that we are working for charity. Judged from the most liberal newspaper standards we are well paid for the work. But there is something more than the money in it. There is the feeling that we are doing good; not merely to the few who are already in, but to the many who might get in with help. We believe that any man of intelligence, of imagination, of perseverence, can become a photoplay writer if he sticks to it. We believe that the man who possesses these three attributes stands a better chance of success in photoplay than in story writing or in newspaper work. Mr. McCardell can remember the time when he was an absolute novice. He, like all others, had to make a start. His success has been greater than the average through mental capacity and persistent application, but there was a time when he could not write just as there was a time when Jack London could not write, when Sir Walter Scott could not write, when Dumas could not write. We think it foolish to argue that a person must first become a magazine writer in order to find success in photoplay.

It is true that most of the present successful writers of photoplays are also possessed of records as writers of stories, but this is merely because their acquired knowledge of plotting stands them in good stead. It would be worse than foolish to argue that the coming generations must follow the same path and first become magazinists in order to become photoplay writers.

For that matter we believe that we have helped more than one writer to his present success. Take John William Kellette, for a shining example. He was never a story writer, yet in less than two years he is one of the few outsiders who sell to the Thanhouser Company and is assistant editor of the Whitman Feature Company. There are a dozen others we might name who never even tried story writing and yet who have found success in photoplay. We believe that most of the photoplay writers of the next generation will get such success as they find in fiction through their earlier success in writing photoplays, and we believe that these potentially successful writers will be found among those who are at present in the novice class, but who possess the necessary persistence to stick to their studies until they gain success.

And lastly we decline to accept the Woods dictum that but one script in a thousand is worth while. The generality of editors place it at two in the hundred. It is true that actually thousands of incompetents waste postage in flooding the studios with utterly impossible work, but the average is not as small as one-tenth of one per cent. We are not trying to bring "hope to the hopeless," but hope and help to the faithful, for we believe that five years from now the man who has specialized in photoplay will stand a better chance than the veteran magazinist, if only he possesses imagination and the plot ability to direct that imagination into the proper channels.

If You Live in Rochester

If you live in Rochester, N. Y., and want to get in an Inquest Circle, there is a coroness there who has the starting of such a circle and a stamped and self-addressed envelope will bring you the rest of the particulars. Be busy.

Arrived

John William Kellette is now the editor for the Whitman Film Company. Writer would be a better word than editor, for the Whitman makes special films and the editor does not edit, but writes these stories to suit the peculiar conditions of that studio.

A year ago Mr. Kellette had hardly graduated from the novice class, though he had several years of hard work behind him. Then, like others, he found himself. In the last few months he has written many of the Thanhouser and Princess stories, and now he is an editor himself.

Given intelligence and hard work, the combination is bound to succeed, and the harder and longer the work the more lasting is the success it brings.

The Waiting Game

Lately in the Inquiry department we announced that we had had some scripts out for more than a year. Several correspondents have queried the statement and two politely intimated that the truth was not in us. The last batch of release slips we signed (May 20) were for stories submitted March 29, of last year, and January 31 and May 11 of this year. The six previous slips were all for stories dated in March and April of this year.

This does not mean that the straight free lance should be willing to let a script lie with a company for twelve months at a stretch, but it does argue that the longer it stays, in reason, the more apt it is to take root. The year-old script could not have been made when it was first sent in. It was permitted to lie until the inevitable change brought the favorable condition. More than once we have had a script made the same day it was received, and just as many times we have waited a year or more. Outside of the couple of hundred times we have intimated to some editor we were likely to starve to death before he came to a decision, we've found it paid to wait and wait with gentle patience.

Practice.

Just now a novice told us that she had trouble in getting her idea from her mind to the paper. This is what we told her:

Take an idea, any idea. Set your machine to triple space, that is, so that it turns up three lines at a time, writing only on each third line. Write the idea. Go over it. See what has been left out. See what has been left in that should have been left out. Add what is missing. Remove what has no business there. Now without copying from the sheet, but from memory, write this again. Do the same editing. Now make a third copy and a fourth. Work on that one idea until you are content that you cannot possibly better it whether this last draft is the twentieth or the fiftieth copy.

Now take another idea and do the same thing. Then take another idea and another until with only two or three trials a reasonably good copy can be made. This is the only way to gain facility and clearness of expression.

That's easy with a two hundred and fifty word synopsis. Suppose you had to write a 30,000 word story over three times. Yet it is from doing over the long length stories that fiction writers gain their ease and strength of expression and it can come in no other way.

Mr. Merwin Says:

We quote portions of a recent interview with Bannister Merwin printed in the London Bioscope. Among other things he says:

We (The London Film Co.) are succeeding in arousing the interest of more authors of repute every day. In the latter connection I do not mean merely buying up the kinematograph rights of existing works, but inducing authors to write expressly for the camera. Adaptations must always be false art to a certain extent, and I don't think that they will last much longer, or, at any rate, be nearly so prevalent, when writers realize the possibilities of the kinematograph as a distinct new means of expression and learn to understand its demands. It is rather a wonderful thing to think that the picture playwright stands at the threshold of a new art, just as did the Elizabethan dramatists. Like the Elizabethans, they are unhampered by traditions. They are free to create their own laws and their own technique.

Personally, I have always made my scenarios as full as possible, entering into every detail of "business," as well as the broader outlines of action, and I consider this to be the right method. In fact, speaking for the London Film Company, it is not so much mere ideas we are looking for—though we do buy ideas when they are good—as a sense of characterization and construction. The writer ought to understand the technique of his medium. He ought to understand how to use "business" in the picture play just as he would use dialogue in the ordinary play. Cinema plays have become mechanical because writers do not work out full scripts, but only supply the base bones.

I believe that the future of the picture theater depends largely on the development of the fully-worked-out play by trained authors. The producer will always be of immense importance as an interpreter, but it is the story which is the basis of success. Hitherto, the mechanical side of the picture play has developed more rapidly than the purely artistic side.

The construction of a really good picture play involves a certain amount of technical knowledge, which can be acquired by any trained writer with true dramatic instinct. The technical knowledge he would need includes, in the first place, an understanding of the cinema stage as distinguished from the ordinary stage, and, secondly, a knowledge of what the camera can do in connection with the cinema stage. It involves his knowing how to show a story instead of telling it. He must imagine, we might say, that he is visualizing a story of a deaf man. Above all, there is necessary in understanding of time values, and of constructing a story in the proper number of sharply contrasted scenes. He must know his characters and recognize just what bits of "business" are going to give vitality to those characters and lend the right dramatic significance to what they do. In a sense, as I have said, he must learn to tell his story with "business," as the writer for the ordinary stage tells his story with dialogue. Given a story worth telling, a knowledge of the technique of the photoplay should enable any writer to present his ideas through the medium of the kinematograph. There is scarcely anything you cannot express on the screen, even to subtle points of psychology.

The most valuable method of indicating psychological development is what I call "the repeat"—that is to say, the repetition of a bit of "business," or the reconstruction of a situation, after an interval during which something has happened to further the action and to cause the bit of "business" or reconstructed situation to have a new effect on the characters involved.

Sub-titles are of great value to heighten effect, but, at the same time, the story should be clear without them. They are, however, legitimate and desirable as aids to emphasis—or as "punctuation marks," if I may put it in that way.

There has been a good deal of talk lately about things being "too artistic" or "too high-class." Nothing can be "too high-class." Things are either interesting or uninteresting; that is all. Above everything else, we must always remember that the future of this business is in the hands of the photoplaywright; the novelty of a moving picture on a screen is no longer sufficient to attract. Just as the stage depends for success upon plays that will compel attention, so the success of the cinema theater now depends upon well-conceived and well-written photplays, sympathetically produced and intelligently acted.

Without shooting at any one person in particular, but merely "chucking out a rock," who do you think has the best interests of the business most closely to heart, the man who wants synopses only or the man who tries to teach you the art? Mr. Merwin wants writers to write, not merely to suggest. He wants good writers to come in and to come all the way in. The only editor on this side of the water who can come out squarely on the same platform is Lawrence S. McCloskey. Are there others?

Correct.

A correspondent sends the advertisement of a mushroom school and says:

I was reading a local newspaper when I ran across the nclosed clipping. I could not convince my friends of its deceptiveness, so I am sending it to you, whom I know to be the champion of those who are striving to master the art of script writing.

This is an advertisement of a school that makes us wonder if Eugene Berry Watt fled to Pennsylvania when he got away from New York and the Federal indictment for the fraudulent use of the mails. It follows his scheme of advertising broadcast and it makes the same general statement.

The most elaborately misleading statement is one that reads "One man who gave the idea a tryout, writes that he earned $3,500 in six months. It is possible for an intelligent person to meet with equal success."

We call attention to the fact that the advertisement does not say "writes us," but merely says "writes." We believe the statement is correct as to the earnings, but there should be added the remark that the writer is selling not only plays, but a hardly won literary reputation. No one starting from the ground can make as much in the first six months or the second six months or the third six months. If they ever do earn $3,500 in six months, it will be through their practice and study and not because of any aid the schools can give.

Even a trained writer has to change his ideas and mode of thought to conform to the demands of the camera and some never catch the trick of writing plays. The school in question is a lying fraud and is concerned only in the money to be gained through the simple-minded who credit their misleading statements.

The Vitagraph Winner

The winner of the Vitagraph-Sun contest for the prize script will not be the man who takes down the big prize. The real winner—and there will be more than one—is the man who gets his work forcefully brought to the attention of the heads of the script bureau.

Probability.

Suppose that you should be going down the street just after a storm and should stop a prosperous and intelligent looking citizen and say: "Sir! Do you know that at the hither end of yon rainbow lies hidden a pot of dazzling gold?" Would you kick if he called the patrol wagon? Honest, now, would you?

Then why ask a few hundred thousand persons to get interested in a drama no more probable than the pot of gold theory?

Ever look at it from that angle before? Well, look at it from that angle now, and don't let it happen again. It's foolish to imagine that there is a pot of gold at the end of a rainbow, but it is just as foolish to have your hero go to the gallows when a single word would set him free or some such thing as that.

Bad Examples

Don't follow bad examples. Because something has been done is no reason why it should be done again. You see death and crime used as comedy material, but it is no sign that you should sit right down and build a comedy coffin. There may be something screamingly funny about an undertaker, but few have been educated up to that style of humor, and so it is better to leave the trappings of death to the other fellow. He might be able to make a comedy out of it, but he is more likely to come a cropper and be blamed for all the fault instead of merely his share of it.

In the same way you see a lot of white slave pictures, but don't write white slave stuff yourself. You might make a sale, but you'll take a long chance and in the long run you will lose. Stick to the nice clean stuff and you can keep right on doing business, but muddy your imagination with the unclean and you'll be sorry in the end.

Inquiries

NOTE.—No inquiries can be replied to by mail. Look for your answer here. No question can be replied to that necessitates the handling of the manuscript. Always give your name and address. It will not be published. A list of addresses to which photoplays should be sent will be supplied on receipt of a STAMPED AND SELF ADDRESSED ENVELOPE. The request should be made to the paper direct and not to this department, nor to the Answers Man.

S. A. S.—It is better practice to follow the incidents in chronological order instead of putting the producer to the trouble and expense of visioning back. If your story will be too tame without visions, it's pretty apt to be a sign that the story is not particularly good, but at a distance it would seem that you place too great a value on the surprise as compared with the mental impression a prior knowledge of the facts will give. If you know of the prior facts the enormity of the intended offense gets a greater effect than will probably come from surprise alone.

MRS F. C. E.—Write the company.

J. A. S.—Give the company another month.

A. H.—Morbid means what the dictionary says it means. In photoplay it generally means that the story is too unpleasant to interest the average healthy-minded man and woman.

17 Madison Avenue - New York City

Projection Department

Conducted by F. H. RICHARDSON

Manufacturers' Notice.

IT IS an established rule of the MOVING PICTURE WORLD and of this department that no apparatus or other goods will be endorsed or recommended editorially until such articles have been demonstrated to a member of our staff. In case of apparatus pertaining to projection this means the editor of this department.

Important Notice.

Owing to the mass of matter awaiting publication it is impossible to reply through the department in less than two to three weeks. In order to give prompt service, those sending 4 cents, stamps (less than actual cost), will receive carbon copy of the department reply, by mail, without delay.

The first seventy-four questions are now ready and printed in neat booklet form. They may be obtained by remitting 25 cents, money or stamps, to the editor. Every live, progressive operator should get a copy. You may be surprised at the number of questions you can't answer without a lot of study.

Question No. 35.

Best answer will be published, and the names of others sending in replies of excellence will appear in the Roll of Honor. Permission to use the contributor's name must accompany each answer, otherwise only the name of the city will be used. Theater managers looking for high class men will do well to watch the Roll of Honor.

Suppose you were obliged to assemble the field coils of a motor or generator. What test would you make to determine whether or not you had things connected right. How would you reverse the direction of rotation of the armature (make the motor run the other way) of a shunt wound d.c. motor? What effect would this have on the brushes, and what would you do to them? Would the motor be as efficient when reversed as it was before?

Roll of Honor on Question No. 29.

Joseph H. M. Smith, Forth Worth, Texas, prefaces his reply by saying: "While question 29 appears to be easy, I do not believe you will get a whole sackfull of correct answers." Brother Smith is absolutely correct. I had supposed that almost every one would answer question 29 with at least approximate correctness, but, much to my surprise, this was not the case, and out of all the replies there are only seven which can be considered as correct, and even with some of them I have had to squeeze considerably to include them in the Roll of Honor. For instance: brother Harry Grant, of Placerville, California, gives an answer which goes into the matter in great detail, and which is very good in many respects. But he says: "There are three efficiencies as applied to electric generators, viz: electrical efficiency which is the ratio of the watts supplied to the external circuit to the watts generated; the efficiency of conversion which is the ratio of the watts generated to the power in watts supplied to the generator, while the commercial efficiency, the one the operator should know, is the ratio of the watts supplied to the projection arc circuit to the total power in watts supplied to the armature of the generator." All of which is correct in dealing with a generator, but brother Grant seems to have overlooked the fact that we are not dealing with the generator alone, but with a motor-generator, and that there is fully as much loss in a motor itself as in a generator. I am including him in the Roll of Honor, however, because of the fact that, aside from this error, his answer is very good, in fact among the best ones received. Undoubtedly the brother understands how to figure efficiency, but he has failed to take the motor into consideration. Brother James also stubbed his toe when he undertook to divide 4,300 by 55 and got 86.3 as the result, but otherwise his reply is correct. Brother Minges got balled up a little, but, nevertheless he understands the matter very well. The Roll of Honor consists of Jos. H. M. Smith, Fort Worth, Texas; W. S. James, Camden, New Jersey; L. B. Minges, Lestershire, New York; Harry Grant, Placerville, California, and Harry T. Dobson, Toronto, Canada, Boston, Mass., and Chicago, Ill.

Reply to Question No. 29.

By L. S. Usher, Winnipeg, Canada.

The question:

Suppose your employer purchased a motor-generator set, for which the seller claimed 80 per cent. efficiency. Tell us what is meant by "80 per cent. efficiency," and how you would proceed to test the set, and discover whether or not the maker's claim holds good. Show how you obtain your answer by assuming the voltage and amperage, and figuring it out for us.

The answer:

When a motor-generator set has an efficiency of 80 per cent., the generator of the set is capable of delivering 80 per cent. of the full power applied to the motor. Still another way of explaining the matter would be to say that there is 20 per cent. of the total input to the set lost in mechanical friction and electrical conversion, therefore, the output will be but 80 per cent. of the input. To test the efficiency claims of the maker, I would proceed as follows: (if the machine was an a.c. to d.c. economizer, such as I take the question to mean) borrow an ammeter and a volt-meter of suitable range to suit the set. Figuring there is already both a voltmeter and ammeter with the outfit, I would attach the instruments as per sketch No. 1, start machine and put on the lightest load—spot light or one dissolver lamp for instance. Now take a simultaneous reading of both volt and ammeters on machine A (see sketch No. 1) and of the volt and ammeter on machine B. Having made note of the readings, put on a little heavier load and again take readings of the instruments on A and B. Take and note down as many readings as you can with different loads, being sure that all instruments are read simultaneously. When you have finished, work out each set of readings of A and B. We know that efficiency may be stated as the ratio of the output to the input, so after working out the efficiency of the set of each reading, we take the average, and thus get the approximate efficiency of the outfit. Example:

Readings on Machine A		Readings on Machine B		Efficiency
Voltmeter	Ammeter	Voltmeter	Ammeter
110	5	50	8.8	80%
110	15	48	27.5	80%

$$\text{Efficiency} = \frac{\text{Output}}{\text{Input}}$$

From above figures, output, machine B = (50 × 8.8) 440 watts; input machine A = 110 × 5. = 550 watts, therefore $\frac{440}{550}$ = .80, or 80% efficiency. The second reading can be worked out in the same manner; likewise any other readings. The figures given are, of course, fictitious. A better test could be accomplished by using two wattmeters (not "recording wattmeters") in the place of the voltmeters and ammeters. The readings would be taken simultaneously, the same as with voltmeters and ammeters, the only difference being that the direct reading is used.

WATTMETER CONNECTIONS

In conclusion I will say the object of the test is to ascertain the difference between the input and output, therefore it does not matter what particular type of machine you have, so long as you take simultaneous readings, with suitable instruments, of both the output and input, and divide the output by the input to ascertain the efficiency in per cent. I think myself that machines should be rated on very nearly their poorest performance, instead of their best. To rate at higher efficiency than reasonably obtainable only leads to the usual troubles which false statements with regard to machinery generally bring about. I omitted to mention that when testing, both output and input must be measured with the same type of instrument. For instance: the voltmeter and ammeter on load and line, or wattmeter on load and line. You cannot use a wattmeter on the load (for example) and voltmeter and ammeter on the line. This is because the wattmeter measures the exact watts used, while the product of the voltmeter and ammeter readings is only approximate. This is more pronounced when using arc, where a certain factor must be used with calculations. If, however, similar instruments are used on both sides, the errors will cancel themselves out. If an a.c. motor is used in the set the only easy way of testing is by using two wattmeters. Wattmeter connection is shown in sketch No. 2.

It is to be regretted that brother Usher did not explain more fully as to the measuring by voltmeter and ammeter on a.c. motors. Unless the power factor results might be entirely misleading. Who can explain this in detail?

Hurls a Few Bricks.

Wallace Clay, Ogden, Utah, contributes the following criticism on brother James' article. Friend Clay is undoubtedly well posted in the action of light through lenses. Of this I have had ample proof, and therefore his remarks are entitled to serious consideration and respect.

I am moved by the spirit to register a few remarks on brother James' excellent and extensive exposition on "The Optical System of a Moving Picture Machine" on pages 357 to 359 inclusive of April 18th issue. It is probably not presumed, even by brother James himself, that his article is to be taken as a perfect text-book on the subject, but he is certainly entitled to credit for the construcion of a working treatise, while I merely am indulging in the pastime of slinging a little mud. In the first part of brother James' article he states: "The amount of refraction depends principally on the angle at which a ray strikes a prism, and the angle of the prism itself." He has neglected an important factor. We would revise the definition to read: The amount of deviation (or bend) caused in a light ray by its passage through a prism depends on three principal things as follows: (a) The refracting angle of the prism. (b) The kind of glass of which the prism is made. (c) The angle at which the ray strikes the prism; each of respective importance in the order named.

Brother James says further: "Let us consider Fig. 1C. It will be seen by following the lines with the arrows that the rays will not meet, no matter at what angle they may enter the prisms, or at what angle the prisms are themselves" which is obviously incorrect, as brother James undoubtedly sees by this time. In fact it would be an extreme case indeed in which the prisms, or a concave lens might be of such high refractive power that sufficient converging incident rays could not be brought to an actual crossing, or, in the case of a concave lens, to an actual focus. Follow his lines with the arrows backwards, and we have converging rays made parallel. Give them a little more convergence and we get a focus. Brother James says later: "I want you to get the fact that the conjugate foci are interchangeable." This is true but brother James does not go far enough in the statement to clear up what might be a hazy point in the minds of many. The point is that one of the conjugate foci of a lens system may be located anywhere distant from the lens, between a point just outside the e. f. point of said lens, and a point just inside in infinite distance, and the nearer the one conjugate foci point to the lens, the farther its reciprocal conjugate point would be from the lens. Further on brother James says: "You will readily see we not only have a weaker light reaching the lens, but a number of the rays are lost owing to their spreading and not reaching it." While brother James intimates that there are two factors tending to weaken the light intensity, the fact is that the only cause, worth considering, tending to lower unit intensity of illumination, is the spreading of the rays as shown in his Fig. 4. In his condenser formula brother James says: "Suppose we call the e. f. of the combination the principal focus, etc." This is surely the advisable thing to do, as both these terms are but different names of the same thing. The e. f. (equivalent focus) of the lens or combination of lenses, or, as it is sometimes called, the principal focus, is the universal standard by which the power of all lenses or combinations is compared, and means that distance from the optical center of the lens, or combination, at which parallel rays will be brought to a focus.

In speaking of the rear combination of the objective system, brother James says: "This lens having no focusing point, it is impossible for light rays to come to a focus, or crossing point, after leaving it, etc." Wrong again, brother James. Any combination of positive and negative lenses in which positive curvature predominates has a focusing point. The rear combination of all ordinary projection lenses has a focusing point. The mere fact that we get anything resembling an image at all, when using the rear combination alone, proves this. We know that a condenser has a focusing point, yet, what kind of an image will it make? (A fairly good one. Ed.) Brother James next draws Fig. 6, and says: "O is the crossing point. This point is never in the lens, but always in front, regardless of the focal length (e. f.) of the objective." But he shows rays crossing within the lens tube, although the text of his explanations shows that he does not believe that they do, but merely follows similar drawings by professors.

The most important rays which go to make the image do cross within the tube, however, and, as this is a point upon which I think the editor himself is even a little hazy, I will endeavor to explain the matter as I understand it. Opticians, in tracing light rays through a lens or combination of lenses to find the position of images, etc., usually take two representative rays and trace their paths through the lenses until they meet at a focus. Of the two light rays generally chosen one is the principal, or central ray, which goes through the lens or combination with the least deviation, or, in other words, the ray which goes through in the straightest path. The other ray chosen, sometimes called a secondary ray, is one which goes through the edge of the lens or combination with the most deviation, or, in other words, the ray which goes through in the crookedest path. The "principal ray" naturally goes through the "optical center" of a lens or combination, and while the "geometrical center" of a lens, or combination of lenses, is seldom the "optical center," yet the optical center is apt to be somewhere near this point and, roughly, is often considered as such. Opticians therefore generally, in making rough and ready diagrams of lens action, leave out of the plan all secondary rays and show only one "central ray" from each prominent point of the object (generally top and bottom) as passing straight through the geometrical center of the lens, or combination of lenses, and on to the image. These "central" rays are therefore shown crossed in the center of the lens tube, but are supposed to represent a bundle of rays of which very few would cross at this point. This construction is seldom literally true for a majority of the light rays involved, and is merely an accepted method of diagram. In motion picture objective systems in particular, owing to the fact that the front combination is generally the stronger of the two, we find that the principal (central) rays cross within the tube much nearer to the front combination than to the back combination, but they do not cross in front of the objective system, as brother James claims they do. If both combinations of the objective were of equal positive strength, and were used at equal "conjugate" foci" (that is, if image and object were the same size), then most of the light rays of all kinds would cross in the "geometrical center" of the lens tube; but with the unequal combinations and the unequal conjugate foci, as actually found in average projection, it is probable that most of the "secondary rays" cross in front of the lens tube.

In relation to his Fig. 8, brother James says: "When B in Fig. 8 is focused correctly D will be in focus accordingly." The brother has slipped again. It is not B but C which governs the definition or sharpness (focus) of D. Since C and D have fixed positions O must be moved to alter the definition (focus) of D. While a movement of A and B might alter the general illumination of D, yet their movement would have no effect on the definition of D. Brother James then goes ahead with the mathematics of his condenser computations, and as his condenser action theory is at considerable variance with my own, of course, his mathematics don't look just right to me. Therefore without giving any mathematics at this time I will broadly outline my own theory of condenser action, and give friend James a chance to throw a few bricks at me for a change. Here it is. The objective lens takes a great many light rays from each point on the film picture, and converges them to a corresponding point on the screen. The angle at which it receives these rays from the film picture, and the number of rays it receives from each point on the film picture depends on: (a) The e. f. of the objective lens. (b) The relative conjugate foci at which it is working. (c) The size of the diaphraghm or "stop" used, if any. (d) Size of lens, whether half size or quarter size, or smaller. (e) The make and construction of the lens in question. The duty of the condensers is: (a) To pass as many light rays (as intense a light) from the arc through the film picture to the objective lens as possible, other things being equal. (b) To have these light rays as evenly distributed as possible throughout the cross section of the beam where it strikes the film, other things being equal. (c) To have the condensed beam as nearly centered in the optical axis as possible (in line with the center of the crater, the center of the aperture, the center of the lens tube at each end, and the center of the screen). (d) To converge or bring to a focus the largest number of condensed light rays as nearly as possible to the point at which the objective lens converges or crosses the largest number of its effective projected rays, other things being equal. (e) To deliver the condensed rays as nearly as possible at the same angle at which they are to be used by the objective lens, other things being equal, so that the rays may be passed to the screen with the least amount of deviation. It will be seen that the several duties of the condensers interfere to a certain extent, and the condensers themselves are an unreliable factor, so that the compromise which shows the best average screen results should be striven for. For instance, we would not want our "spot" too big in order to give the rays the proper incident angle, else we would lose more light wasted around the aperture that we might gain by the increased affectiveness of the light that did get through. That mathematics aids in the proper selection of condensers is most apparent especially after the causes acting have been properly analyzed, and in fact this has been fully proved by brother James himself. The only thing is that he and I differ as to certain details. Toward the end of his article he says: "Photo No. 3 is the way the rays appear when the condensers are of too long focal length." I would say that in this case either the condensers are of too short focal length, or else the lamp house is too far from the motion head. Probably the latter is the case, as the very short e. f. of the said objective system would probably work better with a rather short e. f. condenser system. It is apparent that this article represents original constructive work by Mr. James, and as such deserves much more respect than these few destructive bricks hurled by Yours Truly clear across the continent, but as I have no doubt but that I will be hit by a few complimentary bricks myself, provided these few remarks ever see print, maybe things will be evened up after all. Anyway that is the way we learn. I shall try to think of each brick as a boost in disguise when they start coming my way.

Well, I am going to say a few words even if I do get my foot into it. Let me first display the density of my ignorance by saying that I do not agree with friend Clay's remarks concerning Fig. 1, page 357, April 18th issue. Perhaps I am wrong but I cannot see but what brother James has stated the even and exact truth. I do not think you could get a glass with high enough refractive index to cause the crossing of the rays under the conditions shown. If I am wrong, all right, I am wrong! But I am from that grand, old state Missouri on this particular proposition. Brother Clay is also wrong, in a way, when he says there is only one cause worthy of consideration in the matter of the weakening of the light. Let me say to him that the quality of the lens and its thickness has much to do with the weakening of the light, since glass absorbs light enormously, and the poorer its quality the greater the absorption. I would also say that the writer has occasionally used an ordinary condensing lens to project a stereopticon picture, and it projected a fairly good picture too. As to Fig. 8 it seems to me as though brother James has slipped, or else a typographical error has been made. Certainly, as far as I can see, he is wrong in saying that when B is in focus D would be in focus accordingly, since B and D have nothing to do with each other; A-B and C-D being separate propositions. As to the photographs: Photo No. 1 looks to me like a long focal length condenser, while Photo No. 2 has the appearance of a short focal length condenser with the lamp house up close and No. 3 a short condenser with the lamp house pulled back, although the position of the arc with relation to the condenser might overturn all this. However, brother James certainly knew what he was talking about so we must perforce accept his statement on that particular proposition.

James Answers Brooklyn.

W. S. James, Camden, New Jersey, answers Brooklyn as follows:

Friend Merklein has raised a point which deserves to be dealt with. Theoretically he is right, but I will show why I neglected this seemingly important point. In all moving picture machine lens systems we have to consider condensers as being perfect, so that we may have something upon which to base our calculations. Up to the present time the perfect condenser does not exist, nor is it likely it ever will exist, unless the present methods of manufacture are very radically changed. All the present lenses contain spherical aberration, and spherical aberration cannot be overcome in a single lens. We are, therefore, compelled to take the liberty of assuming perfect condensers. We will assume that brother Merklein's contention holds good, and use the formula which then becomes necessary. Let A be point "F" of the condenser conjugate foci, or, in other words, the distance between the nodal point of emergence and the condensers, and B be "fi" of the same conjugate foci. The formula then becomes minus $1/a - 1/b = 1/F$. F is used as the principal focus of the combination. Secondly this formula is: assuming C as point "f" of the objective conjugate foci, and D as "fi" of the same formula, it then becomes $1/c - 1/d = 1/F$, and F equals the principal focus of the objective.

Formula No. 2: Let us represent the diameter of the condensers as 2e and the diameter of the objective as 2f and the diagonal of the aperture as 2g. The formula then becomes: $- e \div g =$ "fi" of the condenser conjugate foci divided by itself minus the distance from the condensers to the aperture. And $e \div f =$ "fi" of the condenser conjugate foci divided by itself minus the distance from the objective in the image ("fi" of the objective conjugate foci) minus the distance between the condensers and the aperture plus half the length of the objective lens tube. All these formulæ assume a condenser free from spherical aberration. My reason for using the width and not the diagonal of the aperture is as follows: Assuming the aperture to be a circular with a diameter of 15/16 of an inch, and that we have perfect condensers, we would calculate O, photo No. 1, of the article direct, but as this is impossible on account of the poor light quality at the edge, I do the next best thing. I move the condensers toward the aperture a distance equal to the principal focus of the objective lens. This, of course, enlarges the spot considerably and largely removes the spherical aberration. I arrived at this conclusion after many experiments and calculations. What I was attempting to do was to find a method simple enough to be understood by all. If the operator himself will try some of these calculations I think he will come to the conclusion that they are approximately correct. The spot always figures out larger than the diagonal of the aperture.

I do not wish to comment on this more than to say that in a letter brother James says: "Won't you impress upon your readers that what they need is to figure the combination as point "fi" of the objective conjugate foci, i. e. exact measurement from point of aperture plate to center of objective lens when the lens is in focus. The throw and size of the picture gives a bad equation to work with, and when it is worked out only gives us the principal focus of the objective. I feel that I cannot put this strong enough. The e. f. of the lens combination is the distance required by that particular lens to bring parallel light rays to a point of focus, but the optical system does not deal with parallel rays as the condensing light cone is a converging bundle of rays." I wish also to reiterate the fact that while no doubt brother James has made mistakes in his article I still think that he is, broadly speaking, pretty close to the real facts. One thing which I do not think has been taken into serious individual consideration is the fact pointed out by friend James in the last sentence of his present letter; the optical system of the projector does not deal with parallel light rays but with a converging bundle of rays. I am quite sure that entirely too little importance has been attached to this phase of the matter by all our other correspondents.

From Chicago.

A Chicago, Illinois, member of Local No. 2 makes the following inquiries: (a) When burning two arc lamps on opposite sides of a three-wire system and the neutral fuse blows what would be the result—direct current? (b) When using d. c., suppose the bottom carbon should become grounded to the bottom of the lamp house. What would the result be? (c) Can a light be obtained from 52 volts, and if so under what conditions? (d) When using two lights on a three-pole switch, 110 volts on each side, what is the polarity? (e) In a 5 inch e.f. Gundlach-Manhattan lens what are the names of the four lenses and how are they placed?

I hesitated about answering these questions, since they are rather elementary ones for a Chicago operator to ask, but finally concluded to do so. (a) No result at all if the two arcs were using an equal amperage. If the amperage was different and the neutral blew then one lamp would burn more brilliantly and the other with less brilliance, and the net result would probably be to blow the fuses on the lamp having the less resistance. (b) If the lamp house was insulated the only immediate result would be to give the operator a shock when he touched the lamp house if he himself was grounded. If the lamp house had a good ground the fuses would probably blow, but, then again, the actual result would depend on a good many things. For instance: if it were a three-wire circuit and the lower carbon were on the neutral why there would not be any effect at all, since the neutral is already permanently grounded. (c) Yes, you could get light, but you could not get good projection light, due to the fact that an arc operating without considerable steadying resistance will not produce satisfactory projection light. 60 volts is about the least with which satisfactory projection light can be had. (d) I presume you refer to arc lamps, in which case one outside wire would be positive and the neutral negative to one lamp, and the neutral positive and the other outside wire negative to the other. (e) I do not know of any particular name which is applied to the four lenses of a moving picture objective. The outside lens of the back combination is a double convex lens but more heavily convexed on one side than on the other, whereas the inside lens of the back combination is concave on one side and convex on the other. Exactly the opposite condition prevails with the front lens, but the two lenses of this combination are, or should be cemented together, and the heaviest bulge of all lenses goes toward the screen. I suppose there really are names for these various lenses, but I do not happen to know what they are. However, the two inside lenses of the two combinations are negative lenses, and the two outside lenses arme positive lenses—perhaps that it what you are driving at.

Observation Ports.

Again I wish to call the undivided attention of theater managers to the fact that it is totally unfair, and entirely foolish, from any and every point of view, to expect the best possible results on the screens of their theaters when the operator is handicapped in his work by an inadequate and (or) wrongly located observation port.

This is one of the things which it is very hard to get managers, and even many operators themselves to understand. I remember a case over in Brooklyn a year ago. The writer visited a theater and found the screen results to be bad. There were continual shadows. In the operating room I found the operator peering through a port 10 inches high by 4 inches wide. I had the manager come up and pointed out to him the foolishness of such a proposition, whereupon, to my utter amazement, the operator butted in and insisted that the port was all right; that there was nothing wrong with it. The manager, however, had faith in Your Humble Servant, and promptly said: "If you will tell me how that port ought to be made I will have it done, and have it done at once." I immediately sketched the plan of a proper port. Three days later I went back, and that operator was the most delighted man you ever saw. He could hardly believe the changing of the port made such a tremendous difference in his work.

And now I will tell you again how to make a port, and how to make it right, first, however, referring you to Fig. 26, page 74, of the Handbook, where it is fully illustrated and described. Have the operator sit down at his machine in ordinary operating position, and make a mark on the wall, about on a line with the lower edge of the screen and the operator's eyes, or a couple of inches below that line. Now using that mark as a bottom line, cut a hole in the wall of the room 12 inches wide by 24 inches high. Next get a piece of asbestos board or No. 14 sheet metal and, in its center, cut a hole 10 inches wide by 6 inches high. Have this shutter of such length that when the bottom of the hole is at the bottom of the hole in the wall the top of the shutter still laps over the upper edge by one or two inches; also have the bottom of the shutter of such length that when the top edge of the hole in the shutter is at the top edge of the hole in the wall ,the lower end of the shutter still lacks one or two inches of being up to the lower edge of the hole in the wall. This sounds complicated, but it really is extremely simple. Now place this shutter over the opening so that it will slip in grooves, but make a double groove so that the fire shutter will be behind the sliding shutter in its usual position. Next put an ordinary sash pulley on the wall over the long shutter, and another one a little to one side, run a rope over the top of these pulleys, and attach a sash weight to its other end. You thus have an actual observation port opening 6 inches high and 10 inches wide, but you have an effective port 10 inches wide by about 24 inches high, and the operator, by reason of the width of the port, can see his whole picture all the time. If he wants to sit down, he pulls the shutter down; if he wants to stand up he raises the shutter—and there you are.

There are, of course, some little "coops" with low ceilings where it would be difficult to install a port of this kind, by reason of the fact that the ceiling is too low to allow of the shutter raising high enough for the installation of such a shutter. Where it can be done it would be worth a hundred times its cost in the improved results. The fire department cannot possibly object, for the simple reason that there is only an actual opening 6 by 10 inches, which is, in most cities, the legal requirement, or if the legal requirement is less than that why then make it iss, but always have the long way of the port horisontal, NOT vertical. That is a mistake that nine out of ten theater managers make in designing their operating room observation ports.

Racing the Pictures.

On Friday evening, April 24th, at about 7 o'clock, the editor, having little more than an hour spare time, and being in that neighborhood, bought tickets for himself and two friends and entered the Strand Theater. A scenic reel was being run at the time we entered. I use the word "run" advisedly. It was followed at 7.05 by the "Chicken Chaser" which was also "run," though perhaps "gallop" would suit better. At a guess I should say this reel was put through at the rate of at least 75 feet to the minute, the result being a jumping-jack performance on the screen which, while it was to a certain extent ludicrous, certainly was not entertaining. This reel was followed by "The Spoilers." Our time only allowed us to remain for one or two reels of this production, but during the time we were there it was run at correct speed, and splendidly projected. The music by the organ was simply magnificent. That is the only word which fits. I cannot praise it too highly. Neither have I any criticism whatever to make on the protection of what I saw of "The Spoilers."

As it was, however, the writer feels that he paid good, hard money for something he did not get, or at least only partially received, because the projection of the scenic and the comedy was a farce. Although the light was good and well handled, the speed made the whole thing a ridiculous fiasco.

Just why The Strand management would tolerate such a performance as this, I do not know. If it were a legitimate theater and this comedy was being enacted by real actors on the stage, the Strand management would not dream of asking them to work at double speed, and thus ruin the whole act. If the management did such a thing as this, the audience would probably make their protest felt. It seems, however, that moving picture theater managers will calmly do with the shadow actors that which they would not dream of doing, or dare to do with the actor himself, and, moreover, the audience will stand for it, though by no stretch of the imagination could we think the audience is pleased. In an East Side five-cent theater we expect to see the chase-em-through stunt pulled off, but when I pay 50 cents, or, in this case, $1.50 for an hour's entertainment, I certainly expect it to be entertainment, and not an absurd travesty. Strong words? Yes. But I paid my good money and did not get value received, whereas had the show been run at proper speed I would have considered that I had received value in the hour we stayed.

He Is Jealous.

F. M. Hill, of the Garden Theater Company, New Haven, Connecticut, arises to make the following remarks:

Having received many valuable suggestions through your columns, and, besides, being jealous of the commendation of my manager's contribution to the advertising department recently received, I take the liberty of contributing the following, which I trust may be useful to the technicists in the business. Being an owner as well as an electrician and operator I will reserve what I think about an operator's relation to his manager until we meet face to face. I will do my knocking then. However, my present operator and myself work hand in hand for good projection, and he has proved some of these enclosed ideas of mine to be entirely practicable. Our supply is 220 a. c. Have Power's Six and Power's SixA machines; Power's inductor, and G. E. 50 ampere rectifier. In running multiple reels it is impractical to "warm up" the carbons in the second lamp with d. c. from the rectifier for obvious reasons. By means of the inductor, however, one machine is warmed up on a. c. and by means of D. T. D. P. switches the lamp is instantly changed to d. c. the minute the film starts. All that is noticeable on the screen is a slight discoloration for perhaps ten seconds. This works out better than stealing current from the rectifier and there is always light on the screen. The a. c. serves to warm up the carbons enough so that when the switch is made on the rectifier side it quickly adjusts itself to the crater and steadies. The rectifier never has to be "relighted" when we make these shifts. I enclose sketch of the connections.

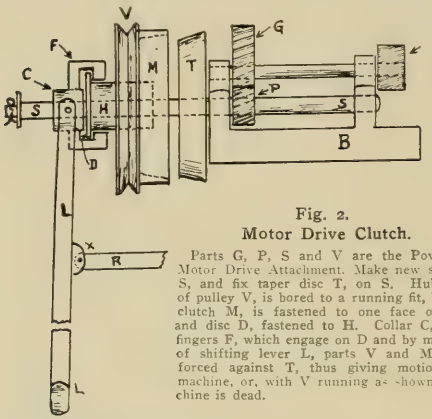

Fig. 2.
Motor Drive Clutch.

Parts G, P, S and V are the Power's Motor Drive Attachment. Make new shaft, S, and fix taper disc T, on S. Hub H, of pulley V, is bored to a running fit, brass clutch M, is fastened to one face of V, and disc D, fastened to H. Collar C, has fingers F, which engage on D and by means of shifting lever L, parts V and M are forced against T, thus giving motion to machine, or, with V running as shown machine is dead.

Another stunt of ours is our motor drive scheme. Our Six A is equipped with a Power's motor drive, while the Six has no such convenience. Obtaining two motor drive attachments, from the Power Company, I made over one, as per sketch and transformed

At S, are two double throw switches which have their middle points connected to arc No. 1 and No. 2 respectively. Either arc can be run a. c. or d. c. as desired.

the combination into a sort of friction clutch and drive combined. By means of these clutch-drive attachments, and an extra V pulley on the driving shaft of the motor drive, I have the benefit of the excellent features of the Power's motor drive applied to two machines. The unequipped machine is simply connected to the extra V pulley by means of a belt, and four fork pulleys placed in suitable positions to transmit power and keep the belt out of the even better than separate motor drives, inasmuch as the speed of both machines is in control at one point, and from this point the power is also simultaneously applied to one machine and shut off from the other. One operator can thus not only keep the machines running continuously by shifting power at the proper moment—at the same instant he shifts the rectifier current from machine to machine, but he can also rewind his own films and patch them, and he is not kicking about overwork either. He is boss of the operating room and invites you to pay us an "I spy" visit any time you like, and also offers to bet you dollars to hard boiled eggs you cannot get anything on him in the way of bum work. All of which goes to show that a good operator, with proper tools, does not need an assistant.

Whereupon I proceed to tell you, brother Hill, that your article is very good, and 'taint so. The rectifier-inductor stunt doubtless works very well. We thank you for its contribution. Also the motor drive proposition has distinct value in installation such as yours. But I will do my knocking right now, and when I meet you face to face also. I have said before, and I say again, that I do not care two lollypops how convenient you make it for the operator, he cannot do two things at once, and do them both in the best possible manner. I long ago took the position, and I still take the position that when the picture is on the screen the operator has no business doing anything but watch that screen. Of course, I freely grant that with such a combination, and with the right man in charge of it, you might get very good results; also with the right man in charge you might get practically perfect results, but I cannot take chances on there being a "right man," because there are mighty few men who would deliver the best possible results while rewinding a film and projecting one, particularly if he has to make a patch, or patches on the aforesaid film. I think, friend Hill, you understand my position. I am willing to grant you that there are exceptions to all rules, and occasional men who can do such things, but if I say I approve of this it puts me in the position of approving of a proposition which while it might work out satisfactorily in the hands of certain individuals, would work out very badly in the hands of the great mass of operators.

Retired Operator.

From a small city in New York State comes the following:

I am a retired operator, at the present time residing in this town, where I attend the moving picture shows every day. There are three photoplay theaters here. Recently two of them had fires. The first caused by the operator leaving a boy in charge of the machine while he went out for a walk. When the fire started the boy got excited and opened the magazine. The manager being present, kicked the door shut, for which the local papers gave him much credit. Don't you think, however, he would be entitled to far more credit if he kept boys out of his operating room, and made the operator do his own work? The other fire was "caused by fast rewinding." Did you ever hear of a film catching fire because it was rewound too fast? To me that particular thing is a joke, but I notice the rewinder is back of the lamp house, so this may account for it. Several times when I have passed these theaters in the evening I have found the operators out in the lobby. To hear them tell it they are first-class operators. The other house changed hands lately, and employs an out-of-town man who is a union operator. His work is a credit to the I. A. T. S. E.

No, I never heard of a film catching fire through rapid rewinding, and it is a safe bet that the one in question did not catch fire from that cause either. As to the manager kicking the magazine door shut, I thoroughly agree with you that he would have been entitled to a great deal more credit if he had planted that kick on that portion of the operator's anatomy where it would do the most good, first having opened the theater door, so that the aforesaid "operator" would not break the glass going through. Possibly, however, the manager does not pay the operator enough to be entitled to expect good service—possibly. I, of course, don't know. But it is a queer thing that a manager would stand for an operator "taking a walk" while the show was on. If conditions as set forth by you are correct, and the operators of these shows are out on the street, down in the lobby, or anywhere else except at their machines while the show is running, why things need a lot of fixing around those theaters. Those managers are selling amusement. When a man buys a ticket entitling him to enter their theaters they buy that ticket, regardless of its purchase price, on the presumption that their safety will be conserved while they are in the theater, and the manager will put on the best show he can. If the manager allows a child to run the machine while the operator is out in the lobby, or promenading the streets, that manager is swindling his patrons who buy admission to his theater. He is not only presumably placing their lives in danger, but he is also making little or no effort to put on the best possible show which can be given with his service and equipment. It seems almost foolish to point out the fact that this kind of work is rank, and that it ought not to be tolerated. It seems that any man of ordinary intelligence should understand such a plain and self-evident proposition, but it also appears that some men do not understand it, therefore we have to keep repeating.

Up To James.

Fred J. Merklein, Brooklyn, New York, writes:

Questions received. I anxiously await the rest of them, as the time is approaching when one can lie under a shady tree and study. In brother James' article on lenses he says: "Now mark off 15/16 of an inch (or the width of the aperture, which may vary slightly)." Could he be mistaken in taking the width of aperture instead of the diagonal? According to my theory he is. If not, I hope to hear this point explained a little more clearly, since it affects the question of focal length of condensers quite seriously. I do not wish to criticise, but this particular thing has me going, and if I am wrong I hope to be set right.

Really, I don't know myself. I understand the point you raise, but would not like to undertake the job of deciding, and will turn the matter over to brother James. It seems to me, however, that the width of the aperture might be sufficient for the purpose, since, although the diagonal would be quite a little in excess of this, still I believe this could be neglected without seriously affecting the total result. However, as I said, I think we are all getting into pretty deep water and we will have to do a little swimming before our feet touch solid bottom. I regard the article by James as the best thing yet put forward with regard to the projection lens system, although, as Professor Wall has shown, the article may be criticised, and possibly quite severely criticised. But this does not in any way detract from the credit due to friend James. If he has made errors it is not more than other pioneers have done. Brother James has jumped out a long way in advance of the general knowledge of the lens system of a projector, and has at least blazed a trail, and I personally believe a mighty plain trail, too. If it becomes necessary to re-locate portions of this trail and straighten other sections, why that will be no more than we expected. Mr. Edison made many errors, and so did Robert Fulton, and all those men who have really done anything worth while.

Brother James will kindly come forward with an answer to friend Merklein's question.

Perfectly Correct.

S. S. Holt, Marshalltown, Iowa, sends answer to question 28 and says:

> In answering these questions I find things which surprise me. Certainly there are many things the operator will not take the time to look up, except he tries to answer these questions. It takes time to dig out the answers to the questions, but it surely pays, and the operator who can not only do the work in the operating room, but who knows why he does certain things, and who gives all his energy to the work, is the one who will reap his reward in the future; for I firmly believe there are better things in store for the up-to-date operator at a not distant day. I recently joined the I. A. T. S. E., which cost me $25.00, but I think the money well spent, and that the union is a great benefit, if it is used right.

Yes, brother, "if it is used right," but that expresses considerable. However, more and more the men are learning and it is only a question of time when the union will be used right. I think most of the locals are trying to do the right thing now, so far as their knowledge goes, but it takes a long experience with the labor movement, like anything else, to handle things in the best possible way. You are perfectly correct in saying that the up-to-date operator will reap his reward in the future. I have made this statement many times, and am perfectly willing to make it again.

To Virgil La Vern.

I have referred your inquiry to headquarters. You will no doubt have heard from them before this is published.

Greatly Benefitted.

O. F. Langworthy, manager "The Show," Sistersville, West Virginia, writes:

> The writer has been a reader of the department ever since it was founded, and has been greatly benefited by the study those questions are demanding. There is one thing which troubles us more than all others put together, viz: the utterly wretched repairs made in some of the films. We enclose three patches taken from yesterday's commercial reel, which contained many misframes. Personally I would cheerfully help organize a society for the prevention of such work as this. Surely it does not take much, if any longer to repair a film correctly than incorrectly, and there has been sufficient instruction published in the department so that every one connected with the business ought to be able to make a film splice properly. I enclose check for Mr. Swoope's book and a copy of the questions, and at the same time wish to thank you for making it possible for us boys out in the jungles to put on good projection.

Yes, brother Langworthy, it is certainly not necessary that such laziness, ignorance and carelessness be displayed in the matter of patches, but I have just answered another letter along the same lines at some length, therefore will not comment extensively on yours. I think most of the poor work is indirectly at least chargeable to theater managers themselves, in that they employ the cheapest operator they can get, regardless of his fitness for the position, and then pile a lot of extra duties on him which have nothing to do with operating. In other words, they underpay and overwork the man; also in many instances they place the rewinding and patching in the hands of a mere child, and pay no attention whatever to how he does the work. Of course, the kid is mainly interested in getting the job done. He does not care a tinker's darn whether it is done right or not, so long as it "gets by." This kind of work will stop as soon as managers themselves put a stop to it and not before.

From New Orleans.

A. T. Weiss, New Orleans, Louisiana, has the following to say concerning brother James' lens article.

> I cannot agree with brother James, page 359, April 18th issue, when it comes to his figuring. For instance: F1 equals 7½ and F2 equals 9½ and 7½ × 9½ equals 71, which, divided by 7½ + 9½ equals 4¼ minus ¼ inch separation equals 4¼ inches as the e. f. of this combination. 7½ × 9½ = 71 ÷ 17 (7½ + 9½) = 4.3 17, practically 4¼. That is the way I figure it. Also he gives the following formula. 1/f + 1/26 = 1 4.5. 4.5fi + 117 = 26fi. 17 = fi = 117. F1 equals 7 or 7 inches. I cannot agree with this either. Taking the 4.5 fi + 117 = 26 fi; transposing it becomes 26 fi + 4.5 fi = 117, substracting 21½ fi = 117. Fi equals 5 to 43 practically. Fi equals 5½. I may be wrong but this is the way it appears to me. For proof refer to his equation at the top of page 388 for finding the distance where the ray of light will come to a focus. I apprecrite that brother James has done some great work for this department, for which he has the thanks of all operators, but I think I am justified in making my criticisms.

I do not care to comment on this matter, except to say that there are several criticisms of brother James' articles and out of it all I am sure much good will come.

Gas or Electricity.

Locke Bolen, Jackson, Alabama, writes:

> I have been using electricity but it happens that the power house has burned down and it will be several months before electricity will again be available here. I am therefore up against the proposition of buying a private power plant, or else using gas of some kind. I have had no experience with gas outfits. Can I hope to get good results? I am in position to get an auto-buggy which has a good 20 h.p., two cylinder engine, with a friction drive. Have been thinking of buying a 110 volt d. c. generator, about 3 kw. capacity, and belting it to this automobile engine. It is a two cycle engine with the speed controlled by time of explosion. Would it work satisfactorily? Is it also absolutely necessary to have an engine which operates with a throttle governor for work of this kind? The machine is a Power's Six. The picture is 11 feet and the distance 56 feet.

You would probably not be able to satisfy your patrons with gas after they have been accustomed to the electric. Very good results can be had with gas, provided one has not seen electric projection, but where the audience has been used to electricity, gas would be to all intents and purposes impractical, especially in the hands of an inexperienced gas user. As to the engine: I think on the whole you would do better to purchase an outfit made especially for such work. I know of those who have used an automobile engine and a small generator successfully without any governor to the engine, but I believe that would depend a great deal on the ingenuity of the man himself, and I could not advise you to make a trial. You might succeed, but I think the chances would be rather against it.

Some Job.

From West Virginia comes the following. It is interesting.

> Hark to a howl from the hills of West Virginia. Have been working here only a short time, and hope my future stay will be yet shorter. This is the program for the day: At 10 A.M. I go on duty and sweep the floor of the auditorium; sometimes acquiring a nice case of heart failure by finding a penny, or even as much as a big, round, thick nickel, which, of course, tends to brighten my otherwise cheerless task. Next I enter my private film department, consisting of an impromptu shelf held up by two chairs, and unpack a two days' supply of film, and pack and ship some. Thence to the rewind to remove more or less, generally more, misframes and other defects. Following this I put out the posters and then toddle down to the stage to arrange the disarranged scenery and clean up litter aplenty left from the show the night before. After I have the stage junk in order if I have not earned my dinner, why, by golly, I eat it anyway. And this is done in two rooms which cost me $15 bones per month, unfurnished. Back to the theater again (I am supposed to be there from 10 A.M. till quitting time at night) where there will be plenty to keep me busy until show time. The aforesaid plenty consisting of repairing seats, doctoring the electric piano, and attending to the needs of the private light plant which consists, for the most part, of a classic assortment of superannuated junk, located in a damp cellar something like two by twice in dimensions. After supper I go down and start the conglomeration running; stroll up to my operating room (???!!!), first having changed the music on the aforesaid electric piano. Say, I would really like to send you a photograph of little me in that operating chamber. I am only 6 feet 8 inches in height (the tallest in the profesh, I guess), and after I succeed in getting into the "operating room" by a series of vigorous and highly artistic contortions, there is just space left to place a shelled peanut on the left hand side, provided the peanut be not too large a one. The gallery slopes down from above and shuts off from my view just half of the picture, unless I cut a hole in the ceiling to stick my feet through, and stand on my head and peek through the lens port. For gracing this position with my humble presence I receive the stupendous salary of $50.00 per month. I am blessed with a saving sense of humor, praise be, and am writing this with the hope that it will scare a chuckle out of you and bring forth a few of your delightfully sarcastic comments.

Well Shorty, you are doomed to disappointment. I have no sarcasm equal to the occasion, and what's the use of tackling a job you could only half do? I think your description of the delightful conditions surrounding the work of an operator in that neck of the woods will bring forth more than one smile, probably quite several thousand of them. I am not giving your name or the name of the town, because I know it would break your heart right square in two in the middle to lose that job. Moreover, I think if your "manager" found out that his operator had so aptly described the conditions in his "theater," he would invest one night's proceeds in a box of dynamite, two shot guns and a horse pistol, and you, Shorty, would leave that town at a gallop. Therefore, taking everything into due and careful consideration, in order not to have your gore on my hands I refrain, as I before said, from publishing the name of the town (or your own cognomen.

A TICKET TO HAPPINESS (Selig), May 19.—A photoplay wherein the leading character starts out as the hero and finishes as a regular scheming villain; selfish ingratitude seems to be his specialty. He leaves his sweetheart in the East and makes footprints for the land of the setting sun. He meets, upon his arrival in the West, with a big hearted Swede ranch owner who employs him. To accumulate the required amount of money to send for his girl he deliberately sells some of his employer's cattle. He is arrested, but the Swede intercedes for him and he is released. His further ingratitude toward his employer results in his own downfall. The finale is a satisfactory surprise to the spectator. A very good offering.

THE UNEVEN BALANCE (Essanay), May 19.—This photoplay's plot develops a very pretty little story which ends with a moral. "Judge a woman by herself and not by the tongues of her neighbors." A wife who is sympathetic and big hearted but severe in her actions, made so by a drunken husband, incurs the enmity of her neighbors and fellow church members. She is tried by the congregation, but fate interecedes and allows her to save the child of the minister, and she redeems herself in the eyes of all. There is a pleasing and satisfactory ending. This is a wholesome, well produced number.

HER HORRID HONEYMOON (Lubin), May 19.—On the same reel with "He Won a Ranch." It is of about the same calibre as the other, a farcical comedy with a plot that smacks of absurdity. Nevertheless, it gains spasmodic laughter.

HE WON A RANCH (Lubin), May 19.—This is a comedy; at least it is advertised as such, but fails to fulfill its ultimate pretensions. Horseplay pertains throughout and not very good horseplay at that. On the same reel with "Her Horrid Honeymoon."

THE LIGHT ON THE WALL (Edison), May 19.—This is the fourth story of "The Man Who Disappeared." While the offering is interesting, well directed, and splendidly acted it is one of those serials which end at the most interesting period. To the spectator who has not seen the preceding numbers this serial thing is perplexing and not very satisfactory. However, this number is gripping.

MAX'S VACATION (Pathe), May 19.—A transformation episode has been made the basis for this enjoyable Pathe comedy which is quite apparently offered for laugh producing purposes only and without the suggestion of a consistent plot. "Max," of the Pathe comedies, is always acceptable because of his unusual ability as a pantomimist.

SERAPHINA'S LOVE AFFAIR (Edison), May 20.—A farce picture that gives May Abbey one of her burlesque roles, a "rube" girl. She is in love with a nifty man from the city and even steals her employer's money for him; but good luck favors her and she returns it and then confesses. The plot is flimsy and weak. The characters are good, such as the Edison studio usually put into offerings of this kind. It made some laughter. George Lessey is the author and Charles M. Seay produced it.

THREE KNAVES AND A HEATHEN CHINEE (Edison), May 20.—The audience liked the way the tricky Celestial played poker with his three Melican friends who were out to "do" him. T. Tammoto played well in handing to three nifty characters (Joe Richmond, Horace Newman and Floyd France) a lemon. An amusing skit by Henry Warwick, produced by Charles H. France.

ACTOR FINNEY'S FINISH (Essanay), May 20.—A farce that makes good, if laughter is proof of it. Wallace Beery plays a "boob" actor who gets a job in a motion picture studio and "starts things." There is a touch of freshness in its atmosphere and it is commendable as an offering of broad humor.

THE RIVAL UNDERTAKERS (Vitagraph), May 20.—Queer characters well played under the direction of Lee Beggs, who also plays the "sick" financier, make fun in this satirical farce at whose climax two undertakers fight for the custom of a corpse only playing dead to see the joke through. It hardly could be called a delightful theme; but it is rich in touches of human truth. William Shea and Josie Sadler help, as do Hughie Mack and George Stevens, the undertakers. Serviceable offering, by Robert E. Innis.

TEACHING FATHER A LESSON (Selig), May 20.—Father is brought into camp by the crafty daughter who plays she has hysteria and is going to make the house unbearable for him unless he relents and lets her have the husband she has just married. One hardly believes in it as it is pictured; but then there is no dragging and it never is empty of amusement, although very artificial.

OUT IN HAPPY HOLLOW (Vitagraph), May 21.—This is a particularly fine specimen of the Western release; it leaves little to be desired in acting, photography, settings and general interest. Margaret Gibson makes an appealing figure as Mississippi, the wronged girl, who finds happiness after many tribulations. George Cooper and Alfred D. Vosburgh are the villain and hero respectively. This gets a good start in the first scene and grips the attention all thorugh.

ROMEO AND JULIET (Biograph), May 21.—In this very amusing half-reel the Irish and Italians represent the contending houses of Capulet and Montague, as in the Shakespearean play Rattling good burlesque and characterizations that amuse without giving offense.

PERCY, THE LADY KILLER (Biograph), May 21.—This, on the same reel with foregoing, met with popular approval. The two make a good comedy number.

A SNAKEVILLE ROMANCE (Essanay), May 21.—In this ranch comedy Marguerite Clayton appears as the popular girl, wooed by many admirers. She finally elopes with the man of her choice. There is nothing particularly new in this; it is on the whole about an average number.

LIKE FATHER LIKE SON (Melies), May 21.—This is a business story in which the father forbids the son to marry his stenographer. Later the father himself falls in love with a new stenographer and both couples marry. This is not very new and the humor of it is very mild.

TIGHT SHOES (Kalem), May 22.—Doesn't quite come up to the mark of Kalem farces by this company (Ruth Roland and John Brennan); but it made a little laughter. The trouble is that the business is not new enough to capture everybody and, in places, it is even trite.

ADVANCED STYLES, FALL AND WINTER 1914 AND 1915 (Kalem), May 22.—On same reel with the foregoing. The fashion plates are drawn by the artist and photographed as drawn. It is well photographed.

LIFE'S LOTTERY (Lubin), May 22.—The sets are good and the photography; but the story is nothing better than amateurish. It was written by Will M. Ritchey and produced by J. B. O'Brian.

MUSIC HATH CHARMS—NOT (Selig), May 22.—"The band" will practice in the tenement house room of its leader; but the music thereof doesn't please the other tenants. It becomes a run-and-knock-down farce with some fair clown work and made the youngsters laugh and one or two older people.

AS TIME ROLLED ON (Selig), May 22.—Old jokes are often good and acceptable offerings. The drummer's beard didn't grow while he held the lady's pet dog for her. She merely went away and forgot it and he got tired and payed a man with a long beard to take his place. All this is in the offering and it made some laughter.

THE ROAD TO PLAINDALE (Biograph), May 23.—Can it get into the newspapers that a prisoner has been pardoned before the one who has petitioned the Governor has left the executive mansion? Perhaps. It seems to have fallen that way in this picture. Yet, after all the people seem to accept such things every day. This will probably be enjoyed by many although it is a most plainly commercial and improbable story. The sets, acting and photography are fair.

RED RIDING HOOD OF THE HILLS (Essanay), May 23.—She gets off the end of a Pullman to pick flowers and is left. Broncho Billy's cabin is at hand and no one in it. Broncho's partner comes home drunk and the hero has to protect her from his rudeness. All this is clearly and dramatically told in a picture that might have been much better in its photography. It should make an acceptable release. Here it was watched with much interest.

THE VENGEANCE OF THE VAQUERO (Kalem), May 23.—Full of pretty photography, it gives us a Mexican love story, melodramatic, but pleasing. The heroine is charming and the hero also acceptable. The staging and backgrounds are chosen to help the picture's effect and although the story is not especially noteworthy, it makes a likable offering, one that will entertain all.

THE COUNTRY GIRL (Lubin), May 23.—A simple story, unpretentious and wholesome, it is likely to please the many. The country girl and her husband go to the city where she, led on by her love for dancing, has a little adventure, harmless but for the moment unpleasant. It cures her and makes the thought of a visit to the old home for the barn dance a pleasing prospect. The acting and staging are in keeping. George Terwilliger is the author and Edgar Jones produced it.

THE ESTRANGEMENT (Selig), May 23.—The father of the family, a writer of poetry, is shiftless and is "fired" by his hard-working wife. Twelve years later he comes home, rich; but disguised as a tramp. His wife is kind to him, but his two hopeful children show too clearly that they have needed parental correction badly for long and they get it. Perhaps no one will be convinced that such things could ever happen as shown here. The acting and the staging are a help and it will be watched by most not without interest. Harold Vosberg plays the father; Adrienne Kroel, the mother; Thomas Flynn, the son; and Grace Darmond, the daughter. It is clearly photographed.

RASTUS' RIOTOUS BRIDE (Pathe), May 25.—In this two-reel picture, playing Rastus the title role, Carl Harburgh gives an inoffensive turkey such a mauling that members of the S. P. C. A. may protest. The laughs are won by incidental business and not because of the real humor of the story.

MAKING STEEL RAILS (Pathe), May 26.—It will strike American audiences as strange that the Pathe people have chosen scenes at Donetzskiy to illustrate an industry in which Americans regard themselves as the leaders. It will interest these same audiences, however, to notice the up-to-the-minute methods in turning out of rails, from the time they are mere iron ore until they become a finished commercial product, which are being employed in this foreign town with the "sneezable" name.

Licensed Specials

JOHANNA, THE BARBARIAN (Vitagraph), May 19.—This is a two-part picture that contains highly interesting scenes, it is perhaps somewhat improbable but not impossible. At least it contains much that is gripping and strenuous especially on the part of Johanna. The direction is worthy of mention and the acting of all the cast is highly commendable, especially that of the youngster, Johanna's son. Many amusing scenes cause considerable laughter. A worthy production in every respect.

THE MYSTERY OF THE FAST MAIL (Eclipse), May 19.—This is a two-part picture play filled with vagaries that are certainly mysterious, and one can say that it qualifies as far as the caption is concerned. The plot of the story could have been made strong and tense, but the action wobbles along in an uncertain way and fails to convince. The acting is fairly done and the photography seems to be the best feature.

THE REDSKINS AND RENEGADES (Kalem), May 20.—A good, interesting story in two parts; it makes an acceptable offering, though poorly named. It is sensational and melodramatic; yet much of it is so vigorously played and photographed that it seems like history. Its best asset it, perhaps, the praiseworthy weaving of the plot in which everything consistently works toward one final climax. This makes the picture present itself as a whole and not as a mere collection of thrilling incidents. Another good thing about it is the fairly convincing freshness of its story and the naturalness of the acting. In photography it is commendable without being noteworthy.

LOVE'S LONG LANE (Lubin), May 20.—A picture in two reels in which the three chief characters are very nearly idiotic. The plot obeys the laws of dramatic construction and we are held by it waiting to see how it is going to turn out; but we are not brought wholly into sypmpathy with the two men or the woman; they are not real enough. Some of the scenes are fine, as that in the stock exchange which has been shown many times, and the final climax, after the last weak scene in the office of the bitter lawyer who is visited by the empty-headed wife, is excellent and gives real dramatic emotion. The offering as a whole is below the average; because the story although it has a good idea, is not strong at best and has been poorly put on. George Terwilliger is the author and Edgar Jones, the producer. Photographically, it is commendable.

ANTONY AND CLEOPATRA (Pathe), May 21.—An elaborate staging of the great drama of Egypt's wondrous queen. The scenic investiture throughout is very complete and carries with it the heroic atmosphere of the times depicted. It begins with Antony at the height of his power and continues through his career until he becomes embittered by defeat. He kills himself by a dagger thrust and Cleopatra applies the asp to her bosom. The return across the desert on camels was particularly striking. A fine spectacular number.

A LEAF FROM THE PAST (Lubin), May 21.—A two-reel number, written by Shannon Fife. It tells a well-knit story of how two people with secret pasts get married and are blackmailed, at first successfully, by two crooks, a male and female. This is exceptionally well done and is a successful offering of its type. The cast is pleasing and capable, all four of the principals doing excellent work. The climax is exciting and well staged. A good release.

THE SOUTHERNERS (Edison), May 22.—Both the battle of Chickamauga and the battle of Mobile Bay have place in this more than usually interesting story of the war between the states. We have seen much more thrilling battle scenes in pictures and even seen the story which the picture is telling carried across the smoke and explosions of battle with more convincing naturalness than does this picture in its Chickamauga scenes. But the naval engagement in Mobile Bay in this picture is, we think, as good as anything of its kind. It surely is exciting in spite of the many counter suggestions and artificialities in it. The best picture offers its human emotions brought out by the players and the touch of wisdom that humanizes it and keeps it from seeming to be commercial. It tells a simple love story pictured in the South without any girl spy or other banality. It is not a story of adventure; but an epic and, without being great, is distinctly above our mere war pictures. It was produced by Richard Ridgely assisted by John H. Collins. Mabel Trunnelle as the heroine deserves special mention in a picture well acted as a whole.

ETTA OF THE FOOTLIGHTS (Vitagraph), May 23.—A two-part offering that seems hardly up to the Vitagraph standard for features. The whole trouble is most in the failure to work up our interest sufficiently in the heroine and it seems even to be a case of commercial work hampered by the studio requirements. That is the only reason we can think of its turning the villain into the hero. The story lacks a hero. The script is by W. A. Tremayne and was produced by Maurice Costello and Robert Gaillord. Jane Fearnley is praiseworthy in the role of star actress who thinks she owns the earth. Mary Charleson, as Etta, is also worthy of praise. A fair offering.

A TIGHT SQUEEZE (Edison), May 23.—Good adventure that doesn't drag, a heroine that is a trump card with every audience, and well acted characters make this picture a very desirable offering. It is the eighth of the "Dolly of the Dailies" series by Acton Davies that Walter Edwin is producing. Dolly is, of course, Mary Fuller. Dan Mason, behind the bar, is noticeable among the characters, most of which are cleverly portrayed.

WAR OF THE LILLIPUTIANS (Pathe), May 30.—A Gulliver's Travels plot, setting forth the victorious struggle of a race of pygmies to rescue their princess from the clutches of a nation of giants is unfolded in two reels. A couple of scores of Lilliputian actors and several abnormally tall men are employed, giving the picture novelty which will make it a winner.

Independent

THREE OF A KIND (Royal), May 23.—Here's a picture which will provoke gales of laughter in any house in which it is shown; since this is the object of all comedies, it follows that "Three of a Kind" is a corking good production. There is a germ of plot which will draw a smile, but the laughter results from the genuinely funny business which director and a troupe of clever actors have devised to carry the story along. It is the "Eight Bells" brand of hit-and-run comedy

NELL'S EUGENIC WEDDING (Komic), May 24.—There is nothing funny or elevating in having a man eat soap and vomit all over creation as the result of his diet. Because most people will take this view it may be said that "Nell's Eugenic Wedding" does not belong.

A FATAL FLIRTATION (Keystone), May 25.—Charles Murray, "the man who makes faces at the camera," has the lead in this farcical, rough and chase picture. It is not so funny as recent Keystone releases; yet has astonishing things and will make some laughter.

MUTUAL GIRL NO. 19 (Reliance), May 25.—These scenes of the underworld of the Metropolis have more life and are far more interesting than anything else that this series has put over. It now looks as though something had really got started around the Mutual Girl. Of course the story, if we really are going to have a story, is "hung up" in a most unsatisfactory manner. Of the young woman, herself, little can be said; she is spoiled and uninteresting.

A MEXICAN WARRIOR (Imp), May 25.—King Baggot here appears as a husband who tells his wife he is going to the Mexican war. He comes home shot, with booze. The joke is mainly in the single sub-title and this proves another film in which the "jag" scenes are not funny. The preparations to go to the front were amusing, but as a whole this is rather flat.

THE SONG OF THE SHORE (Majestic), May 26.—There are glaring faults of direction in this one-reel dramatic presentation. In trying to avoid the conventional, it is quite apparent, the man who handled the script failed to carry his story to any logical conclusion; the climax either leaves entirely too much to the imagination—or is inherently a poor finish. The story itself has a great deal of heart interest.

JANE THE JUSTICE (Beauty), May 26.—Burlesque with "rube" characters. It seems to us more childish than amusing.

UNIVERSAL IKE IS KEPT FROM BEING AN ACTOR (Universal Ike), May 26.—This is a characteristic number, containing a burlesque of Uncle Tom's Cabin among other features. The play ends in a riot. The action is good throughout and the photography acceptable. It is quite entertaining and has a number of laughs in it.

UNIVERSAL IKE, JR., AND HIS MOTHER-IN-LAW (Universal Ike), May 26.—The original Ike is here represented by a boy in the same make-up. The action centers about his doping the coffee, rendering his wife and mother-in-law unconscious. The fun is largely horseplay and not of a very laughable sort.

THE ANGEL OF THE GULCH (Reliance), May 27.—A story of compelling heart interest and lively action, well told by actors and directors, and photographed in faultless fashion has given this western comedy drama a punch which will make it welcome on any program. A highly sensational bit of acting is done by two of the principal male characters in the form of a fall and slide down the rocky face of a cliff.

WILLIE WALRUS AND THE BABY (Joker), May 27.—This features Wm. Wolbert in his familiar part of village sleuth. A child is left on his hands and the scenes furnish amusement for everybody except the baby, which cried through many of the scenes. But the close is a happy one and on the whole this is quite amusing. The photography is only fair.

THE DAWN OF THE NEW DAY (Imp), May 28.—In this Ethel Grandin appears as a farmer's daughter who marries a man she does not love. A younger man induces her to flee with him to a hotel; he falls into an intoxicated sleep outside her door. Later she returns to her husband. The story seemed to lack force and there was very little feeling in it, perhaps because most of the situations were conventional.

THE STOLEN RADIUM (Majestic), May 29.—A most unhappy combination of a plot filled to the brim with inconsistencies and a performer in the leading role who fails to convince in the character he is called upon to portray, makes "The Stolen Radium" a deep disappointment. It is a detective yarn, and when a detective fusses around in the business of detecting without giving the impression that there is anything worth while to detect the result is akin to "Hamlet" with Hamlet left out.

A PRINCESS FOR A DAY (Victor), May 29.—A film story of Turkish or Hindu court life, with Irene Wallace as a princess beloved by a poor servitor. The costuming and settings were quite attractive and the story seemed pleasing, though not powerful at all.

THE MAGNET (Joker), May 30.—This number, written by Wilfred Lucas, has a good comedy touch and a pleasing cast. The girl's magnetic personality attracts her admirer so powerfully that they meet under all sorts of conditions. The idea is at first a little vague, but the action is good and the general tone pleasing.

WHEN THE WHEELS OF JUSTICE CLOGGED (Thanhouser), May 31.—Western love story with the heroine riding fast to save her sweetheart from the noose of the sheriff's posse. Yet it is a well made picture of its kind and where offerings like it are wanted should prove of service. The acting, backgrounds, the riding and the photography are acceptable.

THE GOLDEN LADDER (Victor), June 1.—This is a Western number much stronger than the average. Warren Kerrigan and Vera Sisson play the leads. He appears as a young farmer who gets the gold fever and goes West. The scenes are characteristic, but have some unusual features. The photography is good and the scenic effects are attractive. A good release.

EASY MONEY (Crystal), June 2.—A half reel comedy dealing with the experiences of a hired girl as a "movie" actress. Most of the scenes in this are only moderately amusing.

A MIDNIGHT SUPPER (Crystal), June 2.—Vivian locks Charlie in the pantry, thinking he is a burglar. He becomes covered with jam. This is very slight. On same reel with above.

UNIVERSAL IKE, JR., IN A BATTLE ROYAL (Universal Ike), June 2.—The juvenile Ike appears at a prize fight in this number and knocks out his opponent and a score of more of others who interfere. For those who like stories of the prize ring, with a strong slapstick accompaniment, this will prove amusing.

LOVE'S WESTERN FLIGHT (Nestor), June 3.—A number featuring Wallace Reid and Dorothy Davenport. The girl loses out with a theatrical company, becomes a waitress and the hero defends her from insult. The pursuit and fall of the husband over the cliff on horseback was well put on. This number has plenty of action.

SNITZ JOINS THE FORCE (Sterling), June 4.—A Ford Sterling number, in which he appears as a police officer. He falls in love with the captain's sweetheart and a chase ensues, over house tops, etc. This is a characteristic offering, but not quite as amusing as some.

HEARTSTRINGS (Powers), June 5.—This is quite a strong offering, with Edna Maison appearing as a young girl whose father refuses to let her dance. She slips out of the house to go to a ball, is discovered and loses her home. Five years later the reconciliation follows and she and her child are taken in again. Not very new in plot, but well enacted and has some good human touches in it.

SOPHIE OF THE FILMS (Series No. 1), (Nestor), June 5.—This is the first of a series of four numbers dealing with Victoria Forde as a moving picture heroine. The photography is very good and the piece abounds in action of a burlesque sort. The story itself does not catch the interest till toward the end of the reel, but looks rather hopeful for subsequent numbers. Eddie Lyons and Lee Moran are in the cast.

THE GIRL AND THE HOBO (Frontier), June 7.—A quick-witted girl hides the payroll money left in her charge inside a pie, which she puts in the oven when the tramps come. This is the main feature of this Western film, which is very ordinary in its development otherwise.

NEMESIS (Rex), June 14.—A dramatic offering with a tragic ending. Lois Weber and Phillips Smalley appear. This is fragmentary in treatment, but the story is perfectly clear and one that holds the interest. The close is strongly dramatic. The scenic effects along the rugged sea coast are unusually good.

A WIFE ON A WAGER (Nestor), June 16.—This number, written by Calder Johnstone, features Wallace Reid and Dorothy Davenport. Wallace is a young club man from the East who makes good on a ranch and wins the love of the girl, whom he carries back home minus a hat and other formalities. A pleasing number of the conventional Western type.

Independent Specials

A DISENCHANTMENT (Victor), May 22.—A two-reel number, featuring Florence Lawrence and Matt Moore. The girl worships a musical genius and becomes his maid, only to have her illusions shattered. She is glad to accept her own lover again. This plot, whether because it is quite familiar or because it was not more complicated, did not seem to get over very strongly. It serves to entertain in a mild sort of way, but does not represent this company at its best.

WAS SHE RIGHT IN FORGIVING HIM? (Thanhouser), May 26.—This is an interesting two-reel picture featuring Maud Fealey. It embraces many satisfying scenes. It is rather conventional in theme and the plot is far from being original, but the picture is well made in every respect and Miss Fealey is of course charming in the leading role and she is adequately supported by a splendid cast. The photography and accessories are above criticism. Recommend this to exhibitors.

THE FEUD (Powers), May 29.—Cleo Madison and George Larkin appear in this two-reel drama of the moonshiners' country. The story is one of a typical mountain feud and the scenic effects are pleasing throughout. There is a lot of fierce gun-fighting and the hero and heroine are the last of two families left alive at the close. The photography and atmosphere of the piece are good. This contains many familiar situations, but on the whole is very pleasing.

HIS LAST CHANCE (Imp), June 1.—A two-reel story, which we saw without subtitles. It has an attractive cast of performers, including Leah Baird, Alexander Gaden, Hobart Henley and David Lithgoe. The newspaper office was hardly characteristic in appearance, but the story follows through in quite an entertaining way. With the subtitles this should be a good dramatic offering, as there seemed to be a substantial story in it.

OUT OF THE SHADOWS (Thanhouser), June 2.—This two-part picture, pleasantly sentimental and poetic, is full of typically Thanhouser atmosphere and draws for us the trials and something of the triumphs of an actor's life. Opening, it shows a young actor, with his wife and baby, en tour. The wife is growing "tired of it all" and soon has run away with the actor's "friend." It took skillful handling of this incident to keep us still in sympathy with the weary woman and yet to protect the actor from losing in our respect on account of it. It is at once natural and pretty in its humanity. Twenty years pass; the baby has grown up. She and her old father are poor. While she is out getting a job as an actress, he dreams of his old successes and we see him in the chief Shakespearean roles, as Hamlet, etc. These scenes give Irving Cummings a fine chance to show his versatility. Well acted and beautifully photographed, it makes an excellent offering that is likable with no greatness or originality in it.

LUCILLE LOVE, Series No. 8 (Gold Seal), June 2.—In this two-reel number Lucille leaves the town in China as a stowawawy in the hold of a vessel on which Hugo is a passenger. She is discovered and dressed as a cabin boy by the captain. Not much adventure in this number, but it continues the interest already established and winds up in San Francisco. The photography runs a little uneven.

SHORTY'S TRIP TO MEXICO (Broncho), June 3.—It is quite evident that a dramatic chase was chosen as the feature of this two-reeler before its production was even begun; the plot has nothing to make the picture stand out. So well has the chase, in which rough riders and a daring crew of auto drivers take part, been done, however, that the release will be acclaimed in every house in which it is shown.

THE LATENT SPARK (Domino), June 4. A very romantic two-part offering that will take strongly with simple-hearted audiences. It deals much with those two especially powerful themes: duty misunderstood in the beginning and courage highly rewarded in the end. It is, in fact, a picture for the young; we don't get too many such and it will, we feel sure, be heartily welcome. There is stir in it and amusing acting of character. Thomas H. Ince and W. H. Clifford have the credit of it.

SWEDE LARSON (Rex), June 4.—A first class three-reel offering, pictured in a lumber camp and featuring Robert Leonard as a big Swede who buys the saloon and falls in love with the gambler's wife. Hazel Buckham plays this latter part. Leonard does some memorable work in his quiet, forceful presentation of the Swede. The settings, sub-titles and photography are excellent, and there is a wholesome out-door atmosphere throughout. The story is in keeping with the rest and holds the interest strongly. An unusually well-balanced offering and one that gets away from the ordinary.

TENNESSEE (Kay-Bee), June 5. So many loose ends are left in the yarn unfolded by this two-reeler which deals with the "moonshining" industry that there can be little claim that it nearly approaches the perfect. However, a thoroughly human treatment of unusual incidents resulting from an internal revenue officer's pure entanglement with the pretty daughter of a law-breaker whom he has been sent to apprehend is worthy of commendation and will interest many who pay money to see the picture.

ON THE VERGE OF WAR (Bison), June 6.—This three-reel number was written by James Dayton and produced by Otis Turner. Anna Little and Herbert Rawlinson play the leading roles. The story is one of international intrigue between agents of this country and Mexico. The girl is the supposed daughter of a hypnotist acting as a Mexican spy, but later it is learned he was not her father. Many of the situations are very intense and considerable ingenuity is employed in developing the plot. This holds the interest nicely and makes a good release.

THE FALLEN IDOL (Great Northern Preferred).—This addition to the program of Box Office Attractions features, in three reels, is another personal triumph for Betty Nansen as an emotional actress. In these days when wild melodrama is often resorted to in the unfolding of a human interest story, it is favorable criticism of "The Fallen Idol" to say that what faults it may have as an offering on current picture programs have resulted from an apparent desire on the part of the producer to handle all situations without sensationalism. There is plenty of action but no real thrill.

Gunning Joins Olcott

F. C. GUNNING, the well known film editor and publicity man, has resigned his position as assistant general manager of Warner's Features, Inc., to become actively engaged in the work of producing feature films.

After a week's vacation at his home in Ohio, Mr. Gunning joins the well known producer of features in this country and abroad, Mr. Sid Olcott, as assistant director under Mr. Olcott. Although well known in the trade, Mr. Olcott's modesty has kept him in the background for many years. He was the producer of the first five reel feature and the first three reel feature, "From the Manger to the Cross" and "The Colleen Bawn" ever made by an American company.

F. C. Gunning.

The first of the year Mr. Olcott parted from the Gene Gauntier Co., which features he produced for years, and organized his own company with the charming Miss Valentine Grant, as leading lady. He and his company returned from a seventeen weeks' season in Florida quite recently with eight splendid features to their credit. These are being released on the Warner program.

Mr. Gunning is better known to the exhibitors of the country as "ME," the editor of the Eclair Bulletin. He served a year with the American Eclair Co. as advertising and sales manager. While with Warners, Mr. Gunning devoted his time to the purchasing and editing of films and the preparation of lithographs, not doing any publicity work. With Mr. Olcott, he will act as assistant director, thus gaining an intimate insight into the intricate mysteries of the producing "firing line."

"The Ring and the Man"

Famous Players Feature Bruce McRae in Strong Four-Part Subject, from Pen of Cyrus Townsend Brady.

Reviewed by George Blaisdell.

BRUCE McRAE scores heavily in "The Ring and the Man," the four-part production which the Famous Players will release on June 1. The picture is produced by Francis Powers; he has given us a play that is gingery as it is interesting. The scenario is adapted from the book of Cyrus Townsend Brady, and it is a good adaptation. In the course of the story there are a number of coincidences. These are so skillfully treated that the result is logical and convincing. Mr. McRae is surrounded by a fine cast of experienced screen players. Robert Broderick, who will be remembered for his strong work in "The Redemption of David Corson," has the role of Big Jim Martin. Helen Aubrey is Mrs. Jim Martin, the bad woman of the West who comes to New York. Wellington A. Playter is Haldane. Violet Horner is Eleanor Haldane and Charles Douglass is the sheriff. The players fit the characters.

Scene from "The Ring and the Man" (Famous Players).

Scene from "The Ring and the Man" (Famous Players).

There is atmosphere of the West and of the city. The picture opens in a mining camp, with its shacks and saloon. Out in the adjacent hills men drudge with pick and shovel and pan in search of wealth. The locations in New York are of Riverside Drive mansions and of shantytown, showing in unmistakable fashion how or at least where the other half lives.

The story deals with scandal in a mining camp, the kind of trouble that may be stirred up by a married woman who is also a thoroughly bad woman—one of the sort who looks with ill-content upon any low descending sun if in the course of the day she has not in some measure added to her already extended past. The action in the city is a battle between business and corrupt politics, of an attempt to extend a legitimate industrial enterprise and the effort of those who control the sinuous avenues to franchise grants to hold it up; to enforce a colossal contribution to those who, to quote a famous admission of a famous New York boss, are working for their pockets all the time.

Mr. McRae has a fine role in that of George Fordyce, who in camp was one of several to become interested in the only woman in the place and who, when she had shot and as was believed had killed her husband, gallantly assumed the blame by leaving a note to the effect that he was the murderer. His association with Mrs. Martin ends just as it begins, and by a crack on the skull. Under the name of Gormly, Fordyce comes to New York, and when we see him a dozen years later he is a successful business man. It is when he attempts to lay a track through the section of shanties, land which he has leased, that he feels the power of the Gotham Traction Company, a concern which controls the city administration. When Gormly decides to go into politics his troubles begin. The head of the Gotham company is a man who had known Gormly in the West, as he is also the father of the girl with whom Gormly is in love. Mrs. Martin comes upon the scene. The political powers send West for the sheriff. He brings along Martin, who tells how things really happened, which of course exonerates Gormly, making a most happy finale.

There are many good situations, situations of strength and dramatic force, the kind that hold and move. These come fast in the last half of the story, and this statement is in nowise to be construed as indicating that the first half is lacking in strength or entertainment. There is a pretty love story dividing as it cements the interest in the bitter fight between the forces of evil on the one side and the man who dares to stand for the right on the other, and who stands for the right even when all surface signs point to his financial and social destruction.

Miss Horner gives splendid support to Mr. McRae. Hers is a finished performance, revealing excellent judgment in the big moments. Mr. Playter, as the chief of the forces opposing Gormly, contributes his full share to the making of an excellent picture. "The Ring and the Man" should be a hit.

British Notes.

(Special Correspondence to THE WORLD.)

THE well known gardens at Rocherville, Gravesend, London, have been taken over by a film producing company and are henceforth to be used for the production of features.

Mr. Cherry Kearton, the intrepid wild animal photographer, has returned this week from an extensive tour across Africa. The expedition began a little over a year ago from Nairobi and Mr. Kearton was accompanied by a New Yorker, Mr. Barnes, and a hundred natives. Even at such a place as Nairobi, says Mr. Kearton, there are good modern picture theaters. The party traveled through Abyssinia, British East Africa, Uganda, Belgium Congo and the French Congo, finishing at the latter place twelve months after the start. Many and amazing are the pictures secured of lions, giraffes, and rhinoceroses in their native haunts, some being exposed only a few feet away from the animal. In all Mr. Kearton has returned with seventeen thousand feet of negative. The boy chief of Uganda made the party especially welcome, for he has a camera and a modern moving picture theater equipped for his own private use. He has quite a library of recent American, British and French releases which have been collected for him. Mr. Kearton is evidently a philanthropist, for he has announced his intention to present to the principal museums in the world copies of his films. The American Museum of Natural History in New York will show Mr. Kearton's pictures in the lecture hall to the public free of charge.

S. W. Bishop, who recently returned from the States, has now established himself as the agent of the Balboa Co., at 29 Charing Cross Road, London. Mr. Bishop's business title will be Bishop Pessers and Co., Ltd., and he will handle Balboa productions for the whole of Europe.

Sir Johnston Forbes-Robertson, the actor, has also returned from his recent tour in America. He thinks that both in America and England motion pictures "will not injure the ordinary theater, but on the other hand will create a growing demand for good healthy drama.."

"The Golden Heart" Without Villainy.

Great Northern Preferred Photoplay in Three Parts Will Especially Please Those Who Complain of Stories That "Leave a Bad Taste in the Mouth."

Reviewed by Randall M. White.

PERHAPS the most common complaint made by American audiences when foreign-made photoplays are under discussion is that they "leave a bad taste in the mouth." This is a somewhat sweeping complaint made upon the presumption that the foreign companies who sell their dramatic subjects in this country know of no tense dramatic plot which does not involve the "Social Triangle"—the plot that deals with the wrecking of a home through the faithlessness of a husband or wife, or the deep-dyed villany of a jealous suitor. In denying the impeachment of this presumption, one could not be fair without saying that so considerable a number of the foreign dramatic photoplays are worked out along the lines indicated that there is at least some grounds for it.

Scene from "The Golden Heart" (Gt. Northern).

With photoplays in general, whether produced in this country or abroad, brought to their present state of perfection, it is not often that the most captious critic can complain of poor photography, or even of poor acting on the part of the important principals. It follows then that the discovery of a "good story" means the discovery of a good picture and, in the case of the foreign-made pictures, the discovery of a story which does not "leave a bad taste in the mouth" invariably means the discovery of a good story.

All the things to recommend it which have been implied in the foregoing, taken from the mouths of the housewives who sit in at the "movies" evening after evening—and many an afternoon—rather than from the mouths of moving picture experts, are possessed by "The Golden Heart," a Great Northern Preferred photoplay in three parts, which was recently added to the list of releases of the Box Office Attractions Company. The photography is good, the acting is even better, and the story besides being compelling in its interest, does what is claimed to be the unusual by leaving "a good taste in one's mouth."

The "golden heart" of the title is the unusual possession of a wealthy suitor who turns over to his rival the girl who has been led to promise to marry him through a sense of obligation which has resulted from the fact that the wealthy suitor has kept her father out of jail after he has embezzled a large sum of money. It is a story entirely devoid of villany, with the milk of human kindness leavening every situation which would usually be made a "heart tear" for the purpose of strong dramatic effect. The producer from whose studio this offering has come would probably be encouraged to make many more similar pictures if he could sense the peaceful, satisfying effect of "The Golden Heart" upon the average audience.

The bulk of the action of the screen play falls upon the shoulders of a young artist. There are scenes in the art school which the young chap attends and scenes in his own modestly furnished studio. It is a mark of artistry on the part of the director that these scenes are true to real life, as opposed to being true to reel life. Dance-mad America will find a bit of timely interest in the studio scene which shows a group of students indulging in some modern steps which have not yet reached these shores.

Lasky Gets Belasco Plays.

Well-Known Productions of the Legitimate Stage Will Be Transferred to the Screen.

After six months of deliberation, David Belasco last week entered into an arrangement with the Jesse L. Lasky Feature Play Company, through its executive head, Samuel Goldfish, for the production as screen features of all the famous successes of Mr. Belasco and also the rights for all future productions. The following letter accompanied the sending of the contracts:

My Dear Mr. Lasky: I am forwarding you, under separate cover, contracts giving you the motion picture rights to all my productions, both past and future, and even while writing this acknowledgement, I am congratulating myself upon the fact that my productions are to see the light of day in the motion picture field under your auspices. For the past six months, in fact ever since dramatic successses became popular upon the screen, I have made a careful study of the situation. Personally I have seen numerous feature motion pictures, and concluded after seeing the three productions already made by you that no other firm is as open to conviction as to the value of untried methods, no other firm as willing to innovate and no other firm allows their directors the freedom to create new methods of production to take the place of those which we have outgrown.

DAVID BELASCO.

Among the recent successes from the Belasco house which will receive production by the Lasky concern are "The Girl of the Golden West," which will be produced in the exact locale of the play, with several of the scenes laid in the petrified forest of Calistoga, Cal. "Sweet Kitty Bellairs," one of Belasco's greatest hits, and "Years of Discretion," by Frederick and Fanny Locke Hatton. Judge Dittenhofer, the sole remaining member of the electoral board which placed Abraham Lincoln in the presidential chair, will take part in the Lasky production of "The Warrens of Virginia," he desiring to appear in the scene in which Lincoln is supposed to be elected.

Other Belasco plays which the company will do are "The Woman," "The Lily," "The Case of Becky," "The Rose of the Rancho," and "The Darling of the Gods," which will be produced in Japan by the Lasky people in the locale of the piece. Original Belasco stars will be secured for the production of the Belasco pieces whenever possible, and when not available other prominent stage stars will be utilized.

For the production of future plays the Lasky Company will construct a studio at Sag Harbor, L. I. This with their studios already located at Hollywood, Cal., will permit their making several productions at one time. Mr. Belasco will take an active part in the production of all his plays for the screen.

FAMOUS PLAYERS SECURE MACKLYN ARBUCKLE.

The Famous Players Film Company have engaged Macklyn Arbuckle, one of the foremost stars of the American stage, to render his world-famous characterization in "The County Chairman" before the camera. This celebrated play, by George Ade, has attained an international reputation, and will be recorded in the annals of the stage as one of the most distinguished dramatic successes of contemporary theatrical art.

Macklyn Arbuckle made his first apearance in "The County Chairman" in November, 1903, from which date he continued to play the character of Jim Hackler, without interruption, until 1907, thus effecting one of the longest runs ever attained by an American play.

The story is thoroughly typical of America, and George Ade has succeeded in injecting into the play a fund of humor universally famed. The quaint characterizations, the faithful depiction of the cares and mock-seriousness of country politics, and the strong drama that underlies the plot, make the subject one of the greatest ever yet secured for the screen, and with the added advantage of the original star, playing the character made familiar by more than a thousand performances on the stage, the film version of "The County Chairman" should bear a tremendous interest for all followers of the photoplay.

KLEINE OPTICAL CO. ENGINEERING SERVICE.

Under direction of manager Frank Hough, the Kleine Optical Company, of Chicago, has established a projection engineering service department, which, if present plans are carried out, will go a long way toward solving projection troubles. The new department will work with architects in the initial lay-out of plans. In this way the location of the operating room, light rays, screens and similar hitherto neglected vital factors in good projection will be given their proper consideration before the actual building construction commences. An extensive advertising campaign is soon to be inaugurated, which will be as much in the nature of a campaign of education as it is for business. It is said that at present only one in one hundred motion picture theaters is so constructed that the best in projection is possible. Hence the new department will devote itself to theaters in contemplation or about to be remodeled.

The Screen Children's Gallery

Yale Boss.

YALE BOSS, of the Edison Company, at the fermenting age of fourteen, receives a large personal mail. It is the kind of mail that follows the screen. Yale has admirers who, taking advantage of our splendid postal facilities, assure him of their admiration frequently and emphatically. I have not been favored with a perusal of any part of this mail, but Yale had no hesitation in telling me that many of these letters started off with an affectionate appeal like "Dearie." Yale, who has a most engaging personality and a wholesome frankness of speech, referred to these letters as "mostly mushy." Not satisfied with this uncompromising and uncomplimentary attitude toward the sweet young dreamers who gaze fondly upon his shadow and then tell him about it by mail, Yale added this portentous and final declaration: "You know I got a real sweetheart, so I just throw those silly letters away." There is an unconscious cruelty about the adolescent male which simply appals us older people. They crack human hearts with no more compunction than we experience in smashing the shell of an ordinary nut. Yale Boss is decidedly a winner on the screen and a most likeable boy off the screen. He is tall and lithe and an athlete.

Yale Boss.

"Oh, I am in the pictures now for more than three years," said Yale facing the interviewer with a frank smile and without a trace of embarrassment. "Somebody here saw me in the Biograph and I guess kind o' liked me, and I have been here ever since. I think it's easy money. I do expect to grow up into a regular big actor; why shouldn't I?"

This being a purely rhetorical question requiring no answer, I nodded to Yale to go on.

"I like comedy, but then I like all screen work. I have been in so many pictures I don't remember them all, but you may remember 'The Ransom of Red Chief,' 'The Printer's Boy' in Dolly of the Dailies series, 'Within the Enemy's Lines.'" I congratulate Yale upon being a healthy, unspoiled lad. He simply cannot help being happy.

Audaine Stark.

A LITTLE while ago I walked into a motion picture house to talk with an exhibitor. Involuntarily my eyes wandered in the direction of the screen, and immediately stayed there charmed by the work of a child artist whom I had never seen before either on or off the screen. The talent of the little girl was so obvious, her manner was so delightful, her acting so utterly free from self-consciousness that I resolved right there and then to look for her and give the readers of the Moving Picture World a chance to learn more about her. The girl took part in a Ramo picture, "The Claws of Greed," and after pestering my friend Cobb for two or three days I learned the identity of the budding genius. I found she was Audaine Stark, a little Southern girl, she having been born at New Iberia, La. It so happened that I was by no means the only person who noted the screen eloquence of Audaine; indeed, she is now kept busy all the time.

Audaine Stark.

Audaine, who is but nine years old, was arrayed for a formal interview when I called, for an appointment had been made over the phone. The interview, however, was not so frightfully formal, indeed Audaine felt sufficiently at ease to bounce a ball up and down while she delivered her views and recounted her experiences. As to her appearance I do not want to add any words to the pictures printed herewith.

Audine in Her Natural Mood.

Madame Blache is chiefly responsible for the start of little Audaine. Audaine had been hunting studios with her mother and had found very scant encouragement until Madame Blache saw her. She was struck with the beauty and the mobility of face of the applicant for screen honors, and she did not hesitate a minute. She engaged Audaine to play a part in "Moulin Rouge," which she acted so well that Madame Blache soon employed her again. Little Audaine's latest appearance was in "Hearts of Oak."

Strangely enough, this child bubbling over with infectious joyousness is almost invariably cast for sad and serious parts.

One minute after the interview, Audaine was playing in the sunshine bouncing her ball vigorously. More than ever I thought then of Tintoretto's head of a child.

The Motion Picture Exhibitor

GETTING READY AT DAYTON..

Managing Director Wiley Busy With Arrangements and Plans for Entertaining Exhibitors—Good Amusement Program Promised.

ACCORDING to the latest reports from Dayton, Ohio, the fourth annual convention of the Motion Picture Exhibitors' League of America and the Second International Exposition of Motion Picture Art, which will be held during the week of that meeting, promise to be the greatest of motion picture trade events yet held in America. Demands for space in the convention hall has compelled the management to sub-divide the Auditorium floor to accommodate the applicants and the requests for hotel reservations from exhibitors indicates that there will be a record breaking attendance.

At the offices of Secretary George H. Wiley, managing director of the exposition, there is a hum of activity. Clerks and stenographers are working overtime to keep up with the flood of correspondence from applicants for all sorts of accommodation, and the indications are that there will be a great overflow in the matter of attendance.

Special inducements are being offered to exhibitors in the way of freight and storage concessions. Arrangements have been made with the Union Storage Company and the American Express Company for the prompt handling of freight and express matter. Goods intended for exposition will be cared for free of storage charges by the above companies even though they arrive a week or two before the convention opens. A minimum rate for transfer has been secured from the Union Storage Company.

The convention and exposition hall will be opened on Monday, July 6, but it will be open for exhibitors June 29, when exhibits can be set up. The convention hall will be open at 9:30 o'clock each day during the meeting for the convenience of exhibitors, but the public will not be admitted before 1:30 o'clock. This is for the purpose of enabling the manufacturers to meet and transact business with the exhibitors. To encourage buying at the convention the management has arranged a series of prize offers in cash to the exhibitors who buy the largest volume of goods. The prizes range from $50 for the first to $10 for the sixth.

One of the features of the convention and exposition will be a manufacturers' parade on Thursday, July 9. The manufacturer having the best display will receive a cash prize of $25. Prizes will be offered for the State branch making the best showing, Ohio excepted. Other interesting prizes will also be offered.

Great preparations are being made by the citizens of Dayton to make the event a gala occasion. The streets will be decorated and lighted in regular carnival style. Excursion trains will be run from nearby points and every means toward making the exposition a success will be employed.

It will be a great week for Dayton.

A WASHINGTON SCREEN CLUB.

Plans were perfected at a special meeting of the moving picture exhibitors and exchangemen for what is to be the Washington Screen Club, superseding the Exhibitors' and Exchangemen's Social Club. This club will admit to membership managers, assistant managers, roadmen and bookers of the exchanges; proprietors, managers and assistant managers of the theaters.

The objects of the club were outlined by Chairman Dresner, who stated that the first order of business would be the election of officers. It was unanimously agreed that the present officers should continue in their various capacities, and Mr. Dresner retained the chair as president. He stated that the club was primarily for social purposes and he hinted of the good times in store for the members. So broad was his hint of banquets and outings that one of the members from the Northwest section excitedly asked if it would not be possible to inaugurate the first of these the following day and to have another the day after. Thus the officers felt fully compensated for the hard work entailed in making the "Short Circuit" of the previous month the success that it had proven to be. However, the gentleman was informed that his wish would be gratified, but not in so brief a period, for the officers who constitute the entertainment committee as well have under way plans for a second "Short Circuit," which, if possible, will eclipse the other.

It was agreed upon that dues of $3 per annum will be exacted from each member, this amount to be in addition to the monthly entertainment assessments which are to be levied only upon those who participate. This will be incorporated in the new constitution and by-laws which Messrs. O'Brien, A. Brylawski and Bachrach have been detailed to prepare and present at a special meeting to be called early in June.

Honorary membership was conferred on the correspondent of the Moving Picture World and of those daily newspapers which devote space to the moving picture industry.

The Washington Screen Club, as now organized, has a membership of fifty, with good prospects of more than doubling that number in a very short time under the rules defining eligibility to membership. Each of the present members has been delegated as a committee of one to bring his neighbor into the fold, and from the interest already manifested it is believed that the club will prove a great success.

The officers of the club are: A. Dresner, president; M. Davis, vice-president; Harry Crandall, secretary, and Joseph Morgan, treasurer.

OKLAHOMA DELEGATES CHOSEN.

At a meeting of the directors of the Oklahoma branch of the Motion Picture Exhibitors' League of America, held at Tulsa recently, the resignation of Carl Gregg, president, was tendered and accepted and Vice-President Albert Jackson, of Pawhuska, was elected to fill the vacancy. Mr. Gregg's resignation was caused by his recent election to the office of commissioner of Tulsa. B. H. Powell, of Oklahoma, was elected to the office of vice-president.

The selection of delegates to the National Convention at Dayton, Ohio, was on the order of business and the following members were named: William M. Smith, B. F. Rothstein, Frank Leiber, L. W. Brophy, J. L. Olive and Carl Gregg. The secretary was authorized to issue credentials to six exhibitors as alternates.

A number of applicants for membership were elected and other business of importance transacted. Secretary Brophy reports that a number of Oklahoma exhibitors have signified their intention of attending the Dayton convention. The next state convention of Oklahoma exhibitors was set for September 29 and 30 at Oklahoma City.

NEW JERSEY LEAGUE DISBANDS.

The New Jersey Branch of the Motion Picture Exhibitors' League of America, at a meeting held in the Meier Building, Newark, New Jersey, on Wednesday, May 20th, formally withdrew from the Motion Picture Exhibitors' League and disbanded. Immediately afterwards a new organization was formed and the following officers were elected: President, J. Stearn; Vice-president, C. J. Hasenauer; Secretary, Walter H. Meier; Treasurer, F. B. Glazier.

There were fifty-eight exhibitors in attendance at the meeting all of whom expressed their intention of attending the New York Convention and Exposition, during the week of June 8th to 13th.

ALABAMA CONVENTION.

A meeting of motion picture exhibitors of Alabama was held at the Hillman Hotel, Birmingham, on May 21, 22 and 23. Exhibitors from Mississippi, Tennessee and Georgia joined in making this gathering a success. Officers of the Alabama league were elected as follows: President, J. F. Gulls, Anniston; first vice-president, W. T. Hotell, Tuscaloosa; second vice-president, Walter Geir, Anniston; secretary and treasurer, R. B. Wilby, Selma; national vice-president, A. A. Wall, Birmingham.

The convention was very harmonious and a large amount of business was transacted.

While at the Alabama convention the Mississippi and Tennessee exhibitors made arrangements to hold conventions in their respective states. The Mississippi meeting will be held at Greenwood, Miss., on Monday, June 15. Chattanooga was the place selected for the Tennessee convention, but the date was not decided upon.

There was a good representation of manufacturers at Birmingham.

ARRANGING SHOW FOR TORONTO.

Display Will Accompany Third Annual Convention of Moving Picture Association of Ontario, Falling Between Meetings in New York City and Dayton.

G. GORDON McGARRY, manager of the First Canadian Exhibition of Motion Picture Art, arrived in New York City, Monday, May 25th, in the interests of the project with which he is now connected, and which will turn the eyes of motion picture people throughout the Dominion of Canada and the northeastern section of the United States towards Toronto from June 20th to June 27th. Mr. McGarry is selling display space and is working out a number of the details of the show in conjunction with some of the important motion picture trade interests which are represented in New York City.

The exhibition in Toronto has been planned to occupy seven days just between the exposition at Grand Central Palace, New York City, and the Dayton convention and exposition which opens July 6th. It is hoped that many of the exhibits which have been prepared for the New York Show will be shipped directly to Toronto and from that city to Dayton.

While the Moving Picture Association of Toronto, under whose auspices the Toronto Show is being held, has already held two annual conventions, the forthcoming show will be its first. For this reason there is unusual interest in it, and the producers, manufacturers and accessory people are showing no little eagerness in their desire to break into what is comparatively virgin territory with their wares.

The show is to be held in the big enclosed stadium in the very heart of the city known as the Arena Gardens, which is to Toronto what Madison Square Garden is to New York City. Of the interior space, 200 by 80 feet, 10,000 square feet will be available for displays. In the same building there is also a convention hall with a seating capacity of approximately 400, and additional space, which is to be fitted up as a model motion picture theater.

Conditions which govern the operations of moving picture theater exhibitors in Canada are peculiar and quite different from conditions existing in the States. A much stricter governmental control is exercised; the censorship is unusually severe, and the licenses and taxes which are imposed, in many instances, have been found to be almost prohibitive. For this reason the Canadian exhibitors have found very pressing reasons for organization, and for this reason their conventions are always quite interesting.

While some of the less important accessories used in the moving picture business are manufactured and sold in Canada, exhibitors in the Dominion depend almost entirely upon the States for their firms, projecting machines, and other accessories of this class.

Mr. McGarry, who is managing the show for the Canadian association, is not a motion picture man, but a specialist in the promotion of trade displays. One of the things which he has accomplished already is to have the Arena Gardens in Toronto temporarily made a "bonded warehouse," thus making it possible for manufacturers in the States who care to exhibit at the show ship their goods into Canada and out again without the payment of the duty which would be required under ordinary circumstances.

The Toronto people are taking quite an active interest in the approaching convention and exposition at Grand Central Palace and Mr. McGarry and others plan to be in attendance at the exposition in New York City when it takes place early in June.

PITTSBURGH EXHIBITORS MEET.

A general meeting for all exhibitors took place on Sunday, May 30, at the headquarters of the Exhibitors' Association, of Pittsburgh, 115 Fourth Avenue. Plans relative to the International Moving Picture Association's Convention at New York, June 8 to 13, were taken up at the meeting. Plans were also discussed for the betterment of the association. Preparations have also been made for the election of officers of the association, at the coming meeting. Among those running for office are H. C. Kliehm, F. J. Herrington, for president; W. Fritz, A. Baltimore, J. W. Torrence, for vice-president; J. Delves, for secretary and treasurer; A. J. Thomas, John J. Lexauer, P. J. Demis, John Hassner, and F. Hensmith, for trustees. It is expected that the association here will send from seventy-five to a hundred exhibitors to the convention in New York.

STATE LEAGUE CONVENTIONS SCHEDULED.

West Virginia Branch will hold its annual state convention in Wheeling, W. Va., on June 16, 1914. It will be a one-day convention. Big preparations are being made for a large attendance. Mr. M. A. Sybert, State Secretary, has charge of the convention arrangements.

A convention of the Motion Picture Exhibitors' League of Virginia will be held on June 18, 1914, at a place decided upon by Mr. D. P. Wine, State Organizer.

Minnesota M. P. E. L. of A.—The convention will be held at the West Hotel, Minneapolis, Minn., on June 4 and 5, 1914.

Motion Picture Exhibitors' League of Indiana will hold a convention the latter part of June to elect delegates and alternates to attend the big National Convention to be held in Dayton, Ohio, next July.

Pennsylvania Branch of the Motion Picture Exhibitors' League of America will hold its convention at Wilkes-Barre, Pa., on June 23rd and 24th. C. G. Miller, of Plymouth, Pa., has charge of the arrangements.

CHICAGO LETTER

BY JAS. S. McQUADE

William N. Selig Brings News from Los Angeles.

WILLIAM N. SELIG, president of the Selig Polyscope Company, returned from California on Sunday, May 24th, bronzed and hearty. In a brief interview, Mr. Selig informed me that "The Rosary," a six or seven-reel subject, taken from Rowland & Clifford's play of that name, Ed. Rose being the author, will be produced by Colin Campbell in the near future. Preparations for the production are now under way. Miss Kathlyn Williams, Thomas Clary, Wheeler Oakman and others will be in the cast.

After completing these pictures, Producer Colin Campbell and his company will go to the Panama Canal zone, where Rex Beach's "Ne'er Do Well" will be put in films. This subject will be about the same length as "The Spoilers." The Canal zone has been selected in order to give the proper settings and atmosphere to the pictures, and from the fact that the main incidents of the Rex Beach story take place there.

Producer Campbell is now engaged in the production of the B. M. Bower's famous "Chip of the Flying U," in which Tom Mix takes the principal character. This subject will be about three reels in length.

Mr. Selig stated that the animal pictures now under way are even greater than those of the past. The Selig Zoo, at the present time, holds more tigers than can be found in any other similar aggregation in the world. The selection is greater in number than that owned by all the American circuses combined. These and other animals are now being trained by special trainers for pictures and other purposes, under the supervision of John G. Robinson, who is now manager of the Selig Zoo animals. Mr. Robinson is securing excellent results and the animals are finer in appearance than at any previous time.

The Selig Zoo grounds are fast assuming a finished aspect, trees being planted daily, and the fountains being placed in readiness. The buildings are under rapid construction and the boundary walls and the magnificent entrance will be ready in September. The opening will take place early in that month.

Signor Carlo Romanelli, the famous Italian sculptor, and his assistants are at present engaged in making the classic groups of animals that will adorn the fountains and entrance. The entrance has been designed by Arthur Benton, well known as the architect of the famous Mission Inn, at Riverside, Cal. The groups in which elephants, lions and other animals have been cast in cement are attracting wide attention from the residents of Los Angeles and visitors.

Among other matters, Mr. Selig informed me that Thomas Nash, formerly manager of the Selig Edendale plant, has resigned, and that Thomas Persons has been appointed general manager of the plant and of the Selig Zoo.

Miss Bessie Eyton, well known as leading woman of "The Spoilers," will shortly be seen in a series of sea pictures, particulars of which will be given later. Mr. Selig also announced that Producers Grandon, Santschi, Le Saint and McGregor are working on a number of surprises that will be released in the near future.

"Spartacus" Closes at Auditorium.

"Spartacus," George Kleine's big feature subject, closed at the Auditorium, Saturday, May 24th, owing to the gaps made in the presentation by bookings contracted for by the Auditorium management some time ago.

Since the first presentation was given, no Sunday showing could be made, owing to similar bookings contracted for that day. The two weeks beginning Monday May 26th, were entirely covered by such bookings, and as the hiatus of such a period would practically undo the extensive advertising that had been done on behalf of the subject and seriously interrupt its run, it was concluded by both the Auditorium management and Mr. Kleine that it would be best to terminate the engagement.

The admirable manner in which "Spartacus" was presented, and the fact that the business showed a gradual increase nightly, make the untimely closing at the Auditorium all the more regretful.

On Sunday, Mary 25th, the pictures were shown at the Hamlin Theater, this city, to excellent business. Other present bookings in Chicago are: Panorama Theater, June 3rd and 4th; Cosmopolitan Theater, June 5th and 6th; President Theater, June 7th and 8th, and the De Luxe Theater, at a later date.

Benefit Suggested for Reel Fellows' Club.

The Reel Fellows' Club met at the Fort Dearborn Hotel, Wednesday, May 20th, and fourteen new members were admitted, including L. W. McChesney, of the Edison Company, Orange, N. J., and Paul C. Hinz, of The Moving Picture World. The club now numbers 90 members.

Reports were received from a special sub-committee on entertainment with reference to a benefit to be given sometime during the summer. Considerable enthusiasm was evinced, and committees are hard at work completing plans for one of the largest benefits ever given in the history of the business.

The next meeting has been set for June 3rd, at which time the final reports will be received and decisive action taken. Just as soon as the final plans have been passed upon by the club they will be given out for publication.

F. Lawrance, Formerly with Turner & Dahnken, Frisco.

M. Attens, of Fresno, Cal., under date of May 15th, writes peevishly that I have been bluffed, etc., etc., regarding an article which appeared in my Chicago Letter, in the issue of April 11th, concerning the Turner & Dahnken's circuit of picture theaters in California. The data in question was furnished by F. Lawrance, who was formerly manager of the Fresno Photo Theater in Fresno, and who called at the Chicago office during a stop-over, on his way to New York City.

In the article referred to, the Wigwam, Fresno, was placed by Mr. Lawrance on the circuit referred to. Mr. Attens claims—and I hope he is not bluffing me—that the Wigwam is his property. He also states that the Globe Theater, San Francisco, which Mr. Lawrance informed me seated 2,000 people and was on the Turner & Dahnken circuit, has been closed a year, being condemned by the city.

Mr. Lawrance who represented that he had been in the employ of Turner & Dahnken for five years, and who told me that he had severed his connection with the firm and was about to settle in New York City, furnished the information that there were fourteen houses on the firm's circuit. Mr. Attens writes that there are only six houses on the circuit at present.

It is just because (quoting from your letter) "some poor boobs in the country who believe everything what's in The Moving Picture World" that I take the pains to try and set matters right, Mr. Attens. Your discourteous and poorly written letter would otherwise receive no consideration.

Mr. Lawrance, wherever you may be, please requite the courtesy shown you at this office by defending the information furnished me by you.

Movement for Educational Pictures in Chicago.

Miss Alice Bracket, prominent in the activities of the Woman's Civic League of the 25th Ward, this city, writes to this office as follows, under the date of May 23rd:

> The Woman's Civic League, of the 25th ward, Mrs. E. L. Stillman, chairman, is starting a movement next week of vital importance to parents and educators. The object is to induce moving picture houses to run educational films for the benefit of the children. We hoped for the co-operation of the teachers in explaining to the scholars the subjects to be presented, and I went before the committee on school management, but they decided against it. We are asking the support of all papers, for the need is great, and we think, if we can make it a success, it will be taken up all over the city.

Miss Brackett also called at The World office, but I chanced to be out. She claims that moving pictures which many people see are too thrilling and exciting for them. In the 25th Ward three theaters have already agreed to show educational films every Saturday afternoon, when children's matinees are on. It is hoped that Miss Brackett and her league will succeed in increasing the demand for educational films. Few exhibitors have shown a desire for such pictures, for the reason that their patrons demand something melodramatic and thrilling.

If the Woman's Civic League of the 25th Ward succeeds in having the children shown good, education programs, it will be the beginning of the establishment of children's picture theaters in the ward. Such theaters would prove a good investment, and, moreover, with a sufficient number to meet the needs of all the children in the city, and the children patronizing them refused admittance to theaters where adult programs are shown, many of the hardships caused by the drastic city censorship now prevailing would be removed. The World wishes the Woman's Civic League of the 25th Ward the greatest measure of success in its efforts to spread the influence of educational pictures.

"War with Huerta" is Convincing.

Mullin & Tisher Two-Reeler Shows Mexican Federals' Defense of Torreon, with Scenes Made While Big Engagement Was in Progress.

Reviewed by Randall M. White.

THERE was expected in New York City, Wednesday, May 27th, the original negative of "War with Huerta," the sensational Mexican War feature which Mullin & Tisher are selling throughout the country, through the Magnet Film Releasing Company, Room No. 401 World's Tower Building. With the original negative were expected the first five prints which have been made. Shipment of prints to the many energetic exhibitors and state's right men throughout the country who have purchased the feature was expected to begin on Thursday. Additional prints, at the rate of ten or twelve per day, are to be made in New York City to satisfy the big demand which has sprung up.

Mexican Officers Before a Wall Showing Effects of Bombardment.

"War with Huerta" is in two parts and in the aggregate measures a little more than 2,000 feet. It is just what the most literal interpretation of the title would indicate, namely, "war," as it is now being waged between the Federals and the Constitutionalists in the adjoining republic of Mexico, shown after extended trooping "with Huerta," the Mexican dictator—"The Man of the Iron Mask"—whose failing power has been filling the newspapers for months and whose flight from Mexico City to seek refuge in Europe is rumored from day to day.

The picture will impress all who see it with its authenticity. If animated photographic views falsely purporting to represent the lively happenings in Mexico during the past few weeks are being shown, this is not one of them. It is claimed for the feature that it shows actual warfare between the Federals and the Constitutionalists outside of Torreon, and one has only to see the pictures to know that the claim is a just one. While the photography is clear enough to enable one to follow the sequence of events, it may be said that the feature carries conviction of its genuineness largely because of the fact that the public is not asked to believe that the cameraman did what they regard as the impossible in making his exposures.

"War with Huerta" purports to be a topical release deriving its principal interest from the daily newspaper reports of the Mexican situation and calculated to provide those who witness it with a better understanding of existing conditions in the territory for the control of which the Federals and the Constitutionalists have been battling so long. In this sense, too, the offering is certain to prove a big success.

The picture is in two parts and logically opens with an easily deciphered map of the Republic of Mexico with the various cities prominently mentioned in the news dispatches from day to day plainly marked. Next, there is presented a close-up picture of Huerta, and immediately following this a reproduction of the spirit which was issued to the cameraman who trooped with the Federals for months to film the incidents which have been chosen. The strength of the Federal forces and the character of the men, both privates and officers, who have been so staunch in their defense of the Huerta regime is next set worth in pictures of a review of the Federal troops in the crowded streets of Mexico City. The ravages of war are next indicated with pictures of one of the big railway bridges destroyed, showing one of its huge spans gnarled and twisted as it lies in the bed of the river which it was built to cross; the debris of a train blown up by one of the warring factions is also pictured.

Following scenes showing the arrival of Federal troops at the front, Federal recruits at drill, Federal troops in camp, and Constitutionalists in camp and on outpost duty, the second part of the feature takes up the defense of Torreon as vainly made by Huerta's soldiers. The Federal artillery in action is shown at close range and later the advance of the Constitutionalist forces is plainly recorded, the pictures showing the systematic firing of the Villa forces and the bursting of Federal shells above their heads. These battle scenes have quite evidently been taken at considerable distance from the subject, but they are remarkably convincing and are lacking in none of the detail required to prove that the pictures were made while the engagement was in progress. The ruins of Torreon after the battle, a battlefield strewn with Mexican dead, and the rough graves in which the dead were hastily buried are also shown before there comes the switch to a series of interesting views which show the activities of the United States troops, both land and water, along the Mexican border.

J. M. Mullin, who secured the feature, purchased the negative from a free lance cameraman named Frank Jones, who has been operating out of Los Angeles for a number of years. Mr. Jones, who speaks the Mexican lingo like a native, spent several months with the Federals and built up a friendship with Huerta which proved quite valuable. As it is being offered state's rights buyers to-day, the two-reel release is a condensation of approximately 5,000 feet of negative which Mr. Jones secured.

New Yorkers will remember Mr. Mullin as having conducted the United Film Rental Company on Twenty-third Street, New York, a few years ago. His Mullin Film Service, with headquarters in Syracuse and branch offices in eight other cities, was a more important enterprise. Leaving the east, Mr. Mullin engaged in the film business in Denver, Butte, Mont., and Portland, Ore., before locating in Los Angeles, Cal., where he had been for some time before coming on to New York with the Mexican war feature.

It is announced at the Mullin & Tisher officers that exhibiting rights in seventeen states of the Union have already been disposed of despite the fact that not a print has been shipped. The feature is being offered on a particularly liberal plan with the idea of interesting in special feature service a class of exhibitors who have not purchased "exclusives" before.

NAVARRE HOTEL POPULAR AMONG "MOVIE" MEN.

Moving picture people from out of town sojourning in New York City have found the accommodations offered them at the Navarre Hotel, on Seventh Avenue at Thirty-eight Street, so much to their liking that there is every indication that, during the forthcoming Second International Exposition of the Moving Picture Art at Grand Central Palace, the Navarre will prove a veritable headquarters for the trade.

The Navarre is one of the city's leading hostelries and yet is operated upon a particularly liberal price policy. One of its slogans is "A room with a bath for a dollar and a half." The building is particularly attractive, being done in the style of the French Renaissance with outer walls of stone and brick of light gray color and a roof of red tile. Of its 350 rooms, no two are decorated alike.

"Home Run Baker's Double."

Kalem Company Produces Its Fourth Annual Baseball Feature with the Giant Joy-killer as the Star.

Reviewed by George Blaisdell.

THE Kalem Company for the three preceding years has produced a baseball picture—one featuring either a professional player or a team. The first, that of 1911, will be remembered as "Hal Chase's Home Run." The successors were "Rube Marquard Wins" and "Breaking Into the Big League." In language of the theater as of the baseball field, all made hits. The fourth of these subjects will be released on June 17, in two reels. Not only is a real baseball star featured in "Home Run Baker's Double," but the plot touches on matters that in recent months have agitated the millions of followers of the national game—the formation of the new league and the attempts of the men behind it to induce players to desert the older organizations. The story is written and produced by Kenean Buel.

Home Run Baker will need no introduction to the masculine side of the photoplay house; and when those of the feminine side get a look at him they will be interested.

Scene from "Home Run Baker's Double" (Kalem).

Baker not only plays for the screen less badly than the average of those untrained to the camera, but really he does well. Also he has a personality. Followers of baseball will be deeply interested in the close-up and intimate views of the man who more than once at critical stages of championship contests has with his keen eye and strong arm upset calculations and put his own team on top. In "Home Run Baker's Double" he plays a dual role. At no time does he figure in double exposure, but there are two times when both Baker and his double appear to be in the same scene. In each instance there is a clever substitution of a man of the same figure, and as the face of the substitute is not turned to the camera the situation goes over in clever fashion.

There are many scenes of baseball grounds and of teams in action. There are views of the Polo Grounds in New York and of the park in Jacksonville, Fla., where the Athletics did their spring training. The story opens with Baker putting over (the fence, presumably) one of his customary four-base hits and shows the grandstand excitement ensuing. Watching the play is Marguerite Johnson, a great admirer of the Athletics and especially of Mr. Baker. When after the game Marguerite is saved by the ball player from being struck by an automobile, the newspapers print the story and a picture of the star. Wallace, a swindler, discovers the resemblance between Chick Day, one of his accomplices, and the player, and proceeds to capitalize it. In the name of Baker he writes in response to her note of appreciation and asks for the loan of $200. Unexpectedly the player gets a note from the young woman and arrives at the appointed place just in time to frustrate the swindler.

The resemblance between Day and Baker is used by Wallace later when he sends Day to the officials of the Federation League in the effort to obtain advance money. The sudden upsetting of the swindler's plans makes a dramatic scene. In fact, there are a goodly number of interesting situations.

Marguerite Courtot has the role of the young woman who is saved from injury by the ball player. Henry Hallam has the part of her father, the capitalist, who becomes interested in the new league and who is very nearly imposed upon by the swindler. Ben Ross is Wallace, and Helen Lindroth is Mrs. Baker, the mother of the player. The work of the cast is just what may be expected from these players, and goes far to further the illusion of the story of the national game.

Stanley Walpole.

A finely-built and manly-looking leading man is Stanley Walpole, whose portrayals in recent productions offered by the Eclair Company have attracted favorable comment. He was born in Australia, although he has become a staunch American. So much so that Mr. Walpole was heard discussing the advisability of organizing a regiment of photoplayers to join our troops at Vera Cruz. Aside from his warlike qualities in times of strife and trouble, Stanley Walpole is one of the finest of good fellows, and since his appearance in the field of the silent drama has made friends both in and out of the profession because of his personality.

Mr. Walpole first appeared with the late Wilson Barrett, with whom he played for twelve months. After a road tour the young Australian played in two comedies. Then followed a season with the "melodrama king" of Australia, Bland Hope. Tiring of life on the road the Australian performer was engaged by the late J. C. Williamson to support well known Australian and English stars in stock, with which organization Mr. Walpole remained for six years. During this time he played important parts in such plays as "Sherlock Holmes," "Secret Service," "Held by the Enemy," "The Admirable Crichton," and many others.

Following this extended engagement, he went on a starring tour in conjunction with Miss Tittell Brune. Mr. Walpole has also appeared in "Monsieur Beaucaire," "Raffles," in which production he played the title role; "Brigadier Gerard," "The Scarlet Pimpernel," "Prisoner of Zenda," and other successful productions.

Two years ago Mr. Walpole came to America on a pleasure trip, and was engaged by the Reliance Company, and from that studio he went to the Eclair's.

New Company Plans Big Things

Charles Marks Heads Concern Which Will Specialize in Comedy Pictures of the Better Class.

A GILT sign on the door of Room No. 420 in the Longacre Building, Forty-second Street and Broadway, reading "Pierrot Film Company, Inc., Charles Marks, General Manager," heralds a comparatively recent arrival in the East, and can reasonably be expected to "make something happen" in the film industry. Charles Marks is the individual.

Mr. Marks will be most easily identified as having been the partner and manager of Richard Carle, the well known musical comedy comedian, in the days when Mr. Carle was climbing to the zenith of his popularity. It was in company with Mr. Marks that Mr. Carle produced such successes as "The Storks," "The Tenderfoot," and "The Spring Chicken." The break between the two men some years ago submerged the individuality of the lanky dancing comedian and was considered a most unfortunate circumstance in the theatrical world.

For some time Mr. Marks has been interested in the business of producing moving pictures and has been operating in conjunction with a big Chicago studio. Recently he has organized a holding company known as Wilson, Decker & Company for the purpose of embarking in the film production business on quite an extensive scale. The opening of offices in the Longacre Building in New York is one of the early steps in the company's activities. The Pierrot Film Company is the first of four operating concerns which will be controlled by Mr. Marks and his associates in the holding company.

In outlining his plans, Mr. Marks said that his company planned to devote its attention exclusively to the production of moving picture comedies, principally of the one-reel variety. He said that, pending the erection of their own studio, they would use the Reliance equipment at Yonkers, N. Y., and would begin work in productions for regular release Monday, June 8. Eventually, he said, the company would have two single reel comedies a week for release and would offer multiple reel comedies—twos, threes, and fours—every two, three, or four weeks, allowing one week for the production of each reel in the feature.

With the Pierrot Company which is to be the first to begin operations, Louis Simon, well known vaudeville and musical comedian, who has worked in a number of theatrical productions which Mr. Marks has made, will be featured. "The New Coachman," a vaudeville act in which he made an international tour, has been one of Mr. Simon's best vehicles. Harry Jackson, formerly of the Selig forces, has been engaged as director for the Pierrot Company and Fred Held, camera man, who has served the Vitagraph, Imp, and Helen Gardner Players companies with credit, has been secured to film the scenes.

Chief of the scenario writers for the company will be Edgar Allen Woolf, widely known as a writer of successful vaudeville sketches for some of the foremost performers in the field. Mr. Woolf and others will contribute original scenarios, and it is announced that no adaptations will be made.

Mr. Marks said that he expected that work on the company's studio would begin within six weeks and that the studio would be located in the immediate vicinity of New York City. He said that he expected to show the company's earliest productions in a very pretentious way about the middle of July.

"We are starting in business with this determination," said Mr. Marks; "we are either going to make the very best grade of moving picture comedies—a grade which will surpass anything that has been turned out heretofore—or we are going to make nothing. In other words, we are going to make a howling success or we are going to flop like a jelly fish."

"FINGER PRINTS" (Essanay).

"Finger Prints," an unusually strong dramatic attraction, produced by the Essanay Film Manufacturing Company's Eastern company, will be released on Friday, June 12th. This is the third and last adventure of Richard Neal (Francis X. Bushman), private investigator of crime. The story has to do with the stealing of a valuable scarab and the recapturing of an escaped convict. The story contains the necessary suspense and mystery that makes it especially qualified as a detective drama of merit. Francis X. Bushman plays the role of Neal in a splendid manner. The photography is beautiful and perfect.

"KISS ME GOOD NIGHT" (Lubin).

In this picture we have a modern Petruchio and it is Arthur Johnson. The Katerine is hardly a prototype of Shakespeare's heroine, but she has a penchant for playing "ducks and drakes" with her sweethearts. She permits any young fellow that is nice to woo her. She gives him every opportunity to propose and she always says "yes," but next day drops him a line stating that she has changed her mind and forthwith adds his engagement ring to a bunch suspended by a ribbon to her fan. Of these trophies she is very proud, and you would hardly think it of demure Lottie Briscoe. But Lottie meets her match when she gives her "yes" to Arthur; he proposes that she shall make good and forces her to marry him. There is an awful fuss—little Lottie even fights and runs away, but her Petruchio catches her and when she is pinned down in his automobile with no chance of escape, she gives in and begs for a kiss. The company is the pick of the Lubin Studio.

"THE OATH OF PIERRE" (American).

In the French Canadian mountain ranges lives Pierre (William Garwood) and his sister Nanette (Vivian Rich). Pierre is a trapper and applies himself to his calling assiduously. In his absence his faithful friend, Papineau (Harry Von Meter) guards the welfare of Nanette, with whom Papineau is in love. A government surveyor (Jack Richardson) meets the unsophisticated girl of the mountains and enters her life with promises of future happiess in a big city, but instead leaves her to bitter disappointment. In the pursuit of his work the surveyor travels on to other fields and meets Julia Naughton (Charlotte Burton) the sweetheart of Pierre. An attachment springs up between the two, but before it ripens into mature love Pierre and Papineau come to impart the news of the sudden demise of Nanette to Julia Naughton and her mother (Louise Lester), while in quest of the treacherous surveyor. They find evidence of the presence of their foe, and there is a conflict between Pierre and Papineau as to who will settle the score with the surveyor. This is decided by drawing cards and Pierre wins. Julia has already stolen away to warn Calvin, the surveyor, of the impending danger, begging him to leave. This the haughty Calvin refuses to do, and, with an air of bravado, looks up the avenger. He attacks him cowardly from a distance. Pierre pretends he is killed, but when the surveyor draws near to view his contemptible work at close range, Pierre engages him in a bitter hand-to-hand conflict. The trapper is the victor, and with his faithful friend Papineau they turn their steps toward the mountain fastnesses and bid farewell to the haunts of men.

It is done in two reels with the customary "Flying A" quality, exquisitely dramatized and enacted in nature's most gorgeous settings. The film will be released June 8th.

The Southern Feature Film Association of Dallas announces they have just completed arrangements whereby they will enter productions of moving pictures in Texas and intend producing a four or five-reel release a month, beginning July 1st.

Already a cameraman and a cast have been engaged. The business direction will be under the espionage of Clyde Slater and Kirk Reese. J. W. Hill, Jr., has been appointed business manager. Alfred P. Hamberg, who for many years was a recognized theatrical director in New York, will assume that end of the production, while C. E. Buchanan and George Slater will be in charge of the studios. John Powers, formerly leading man for the Imp, will play leads with Amy Hodges. At the present time no decision has yet been reached regarding the location of the studios, but they will either be in Dallas or San Antonio. This will be the first Texas multiple moving picture film to be released and promises to be an innovation. Miss Bobbie Burns, a former Milwaukee newspaper writer and short copy editor, has been chosen for scenario editor and is at present completing the first scenario.

"DETECTIVE HAYES AND THE DUCHESS'S DIAMONDS." (Apex).

This is a detective story of unusual interest and in many instances it departs from the beaten path. Much ingenuity and persistence are shown by the detective to whom the finding of the stolen diamonds and the apprehension of the criminals are entrusted. He discovers the fact that the thieves are members of fashionable society and are on the point of escaping to Paris. Thereupon follows a series of sensational and thrilling episodes showing a keen and long battle of wits between the clever criminals and the man of the law. One of the thieves is a woman whose vanity proves her undoing, furnishing a striking climax. Acting, settings and photography are all good.

"ENMESHED BY FATE" (Victor).

"We have yet to find the person who can find keener enjoyment than the witnessing of a real, live, up-to-date melodrama. We know this because of the great demand made for them. And we also know that no one is complying with that demand more satisfactorily than the Universal. Take this play, "Enmeshed by Fate," written by B. Morganthau and produced by Edward Warren, it has about as strong a "kick" in it as one could possibly wish for. Its first appeal —based upon a rattling good love story—is to the sentiments or emotions. Second, the action unwinds in a series of brilliant situations, and uncoventional complications, culminating in a sensational climax that leaves one a-quiver. The technique adopted in the writing and staging of the play could not be improved upon in its ability to keep you guessing, your every nerve straining with expectancy. "That's the Victor press agent's opinion."

Scene from "Enmeshed by Fate" (Victor).

Walter Miller and Irene Wallace are seen in the lead roles. Mr. Miller, you will remember, is one of the best leading men on the screen, of course. He is further proving his worth by the wonderful versatility and sturdy personality he is showing in Universal films. Miss Wallace's greatest success was in the "Traffic in Souls" six-part feature at which time she had an important part. They are supported in this play with an excellent cast. The play will be released June 19. It is in two reels.

"THE LAST CONCERT" (Thanhouser).

The Thanhouser Film Corporation has made it possible for Ellis F. Glickman, foremost of Jewish character actors, to be seen in silent drama. There has just been produced at the New Rochelle studio, a photoplay by Mr. Glickman, called "The Last Concert." In this four-reel feature production teeming with heart stirring situations, Mr. Glickman, who plays the lead, brings a touch of genuine humor, washing away the expected tear and lighting the scenes with a smile. Mr. Glickman has played more than eight hundred character parts on the speaking stage, being at one time, leading man for Bertha Kalich.

"The Last Concert" is Mr. Glickman's second appearance in the silent drama, his previous story "Repentance" having proved a success. Miss Minnie Berlin, plays opposite Mr. Glickman and they are supported by a strong cast headed by Nolan Gane, Thanhouser's leading juvenile actor.

NEW POLICY OF WARNER'S FEATURES, INC.

Exhibitors will be interested in the innovation announced by Warner's Features, Inc., which is to buy and release certain six-part features so edited and supplied with a double lobby display that the larger houses can run them in one night, and the smaller houses can run them as a two-part serial.

The first release of this character was the "Ruby of Destiny" (in six parts), and this is to be followed by Marion Leonard in a tense drama in six parts entitled, "Mother Love."

During the month of June, Warner's Features, Inc., will release another six-part feature production, entitled, "A Born Warrior" and its sequel, "Exiled."

Stickers are furnished with the lithographs so that the paper can be altered to read "In three parts. To be continued," or can be announced as a special six reel production. Needless to say these productions will be the highest type of open market features.

INDIANAPOLIS MOTOR SPEEDWAY.

The Indianapolis Motor Speedway, where the Five-Hundred-Mile Automobile Races take place, has an area of 328 acres. The grand stands and boxes have a seating capacity of 60,000. The entire grounds will accommodate upwards of 200,000.. There are parking facilities for 10,000 autos.

The speedway measures two and one-half miles to each lap, and has a surface of vitrified brick containing 3,500,000 brick, one of which is of solid silver. Automobile and foot bridges and tunnels are provided for crossing the track during the race.

This year there will be $75,000 in purse and prize money. There are 11 foreign drivers to compete for honors out of a total of 30 entries. Last year the race was won by Jules Goux in a French Peugeot; time, 6:35:05, or 75.93 miles per hour.

May 30th, the fourth 500-mile race will take place. There were no pictures of last year's race, but this year The Indianapolis Calcium Light Company have secured the exclusive privilege, as they have done in previous years, and they will again offer this big feature in two reels.

Notes of the Trade.

IN the fire which wiped out the Imp New York factory last week, it was found that most of the negatives which were destroyed were those made on the Pacific Coast. An inventory of the losses was telegraphed to the coast and, Isidore Bernstein, studio manager and the entire force set to work to duplicate the missing pictures. Director and companies are all under a tremendous strain.

CINCINNATI

THE moving picture may be said to be in full control of Cincinnati just now, as the amusement of the great majority of the population. It is still somewhat too cool for the amusement parks, several of which have opened, and all of the other theaters have closed their regular season, and are now showing photoplays, without exception. This has had a tendency to cut down the attendance at some of the regular picture houses somewhat, but the cool weather has been so favorable to business that practically everybody is getting large houses. This may not continue all summer, especially after the hot weather sets in and makes the outdoor resorts more attractive, but just now the exhibitors are making hay at a great rate.

The Grand, which closed its regular season several weeks ago, and succeeded it with two weeks of the big production of "Les Miserables," has announced the inauguration of a full season of photoplays in which features only will be used. The house will be open twelve hours a day, from eleven a. m. to eleven in the evening, with a uniform charge of 10 cents for all seats. The charge during the run of "Les Miserables" was 25 cents. The first picture shown under the new plan was "A Million Bid," the Vitagraph feature which was exhibited with such success at other Cincinnati houses.

Building Commissioner Rendigs, of Cincinnati, gives evidence of every intention of making things rough for motion picture houses and film exchanges which do not take every possible precaution against fire. Last week he ordered the Animated Advertising Co., a local concern which specializes in the making of pictures for publicity purposes, to cease the manufacture of films on the third floor of the building which it occupies at 11 East Fifth street, and announces that other concerns whose quarters are not satisfactory for the storage and manufacture of films, from a fire-prevention standpoint, will will be visited later. Mr. Rendigs has also drafted an ordinance covering the manufacture and storage of films, as he asserts that the present methods used by many houses are exceedingly dangerous.

"All of the leading film exchanges are taking every precaution in the handling of films at present, without an ordinance, purely for their own protection," stated a leading film man, referring to the proposed ordinance. "Films are highly valuable property, and it goes without saying that nobody in the business is going to risk their destruction if he can help it. Fireproof containers for reels are an old story in the business, and I think practically all of the theaters have fireproof booths as well."

A visitor to the office of Manager C. C. Hite, of the local branch of the Mutual Film Co., last week was Arthur Lucas, of Philadelphia, where he is connected with the head offices of the company. There have been rumors that Manager Hite was contemplating other connections, but the apparently satisfactory visit of Mr. Lucas effectually contradicts these rumors, especially in view of the splendid business being handled by the Cincinnati office.

The Cincinnati Enquirer, the largest and best-known paper in the city, is publishing "The Perils of Pauline" every Sunday, in connection with the exhibition of the concurrent films in several of the leading houses of the city. There has been incorporated in West Virginia a concern which has announced its intention of going into the picture business in Cincinnati on a substantial scale. The company has been organized under the name of the Ohio-West Virginia Realty Co., with a capital stock of $75,000, those interested being Harris Rank, W. B. Stevens, and Charles Wagner, of Kimbale, W. Va., W. E. Deegans, of Mt. Hope, W. Va., and Mary Lopinsky, of Welch, W. Va. At the same time the Metropolitan Theater Company of Cincinnati was incorporated, with a capital stock of $1,000, the incorporators being Ben. Horwitz and W. E. Deegans, of Mt. Hope, W. Va., I. W. Tatz, of Keystone, W. Va., and Harris Rank, of Kimball, W. Va. The larger company will build a theater at Fifteenth and Central avenue, Cincinnati, to be known as the Metropolitan Theater, which will be operated by the smaller company. It is to be one of the largest and finest exclusive film theaters in the city, according to the plans now in process of completion.

A Vitagraph burlesque, entitled "Goodness Gracious," or "Movies as They Shouldn't Be," in three reels, proved highly amusing to audiences at the Gayety theater recently. The production was well handled, as exhibitors have found a three-reel laugh-producer must be in order to produce, and the traditional gales of mirth swept the house during the showing of this picture. Two additional reels made up an unusually generous program at this house.

The United Theaters Company, which owns Keith's vaudeville theater in Cincinnati and similar houses in other cities, has taken title to a plot of ground immediately south of the lobby of the Cincinnati theater, and it is understand that a large theater and office building will be erected on this and the tract on which Keith's now stands.

Thursday being the day on which this Lubin production was shown. The charge was increased for the occasion to 15 cents for the evening and 10 cents for the afternoon for adults.

The Springfield Daily News, of Springfield, O., is running "The Adventures of Kathlyn," which is being shown at the Majestic, of that city. The arrangement is meeting with great success in Springfield, as elsewhere, and the Majestic is reaping a harvest on "Kathlyn" days.

Kramp, manager of the Dreamland theater, Springfield, O., showed last week the kind of stuff he is made of when he contributed $5 cash to the fund which is being made up, with $100 as the desired amount, to purchase an artificial leg for a crippled boy, and announced that he would donate as many tickets to his theater as necessary to complete the amount. With a similar offer by W. B. Locke, of the Pastime theater, who gave 300 tickets at ten cents each, the desired amount will readily be raised, as the tickets to both shows are selling rapidly, and the two exhibitors will have the credit for the greater part of the donations.

MISSOURI.

A NUMBER of unusually good attractions drew big crowds to Kansas City motion picture theaters during the past week. "Brewster's Millions," a Lasky visualization of the fiction of that name, was one of the notable presentations. While it was a magnet for all patrons, the feature attracted several graduating classes of local educational institutions, the grades attending in a body in several instances.

Baker & Hanna have opened the Cosmo theater, an airdome, at Forty-sixth street and Prospect avenue. Mutual service, a seating capacity of 900, and a four-piece orchestra are features.

The Palms theater at Thirty-first street and Kenwood avenue, has closed for the summer. The house will reopen for fall business with new decorations and other changes for the better.

Sweitzer & Miller have opened the Liberty theater at Summit and Southwest boulevard. The house seats 600 and is modern throughout. A Wurlitzer orchestra piano, said to be equivalent to a twelve-piece orchestra, provides music.

The Meeca theater, at Twelfth street and Troost avenue, set a new record in Kansas City, when it changed hands four times within a fortnight. R. L. Bump is the latest owner. However, he is not averse to a little more selling and will turn the house over to anyone who will meet his price. The Meeca is a popular theater, the changes being the more unusual because of that fact.

James Houchin, of Jefferson City, Mo., will shortly begin work on a $50,000 theater in the Missouri capital. While definite plans have not yet been made, it is likely that the new theater will be used for motion pictures exclusively. The new house will go up near the Madison Hotel on Main street and will front 68 feet on that thoroughfare. It is to have a seating capacity of 1,500. Six tiers of boxes are to be installed. A canopy will be an attractive feature of the exterior. A roof garden, to be leased to the management of the hotel adjoining, also will be a prominent section. An unusually solid foundation, capable of bearing additional stories will be constructed. Work on the new theater will begin in the immediate future.

The Chamber of Commerce at Pittsburg, Kan., has offered to mediate the disagreement between exhibitors and members of the W. C. T. U., with regard to Sunday closing and the proposition may be accepted. Laboring classes are unequivocally opposed to the closing of the theaters on Sundays, asserting their only means of securing innocent recreation would thus be eliminated. Street car employees threatened to strike if the houses were closed. Two exhibitors, however, decided to comply with the demands of the reformers rather than launch a general struggle. Twenty managers and employees of motion picture houses have been arrested for violation of the Sunday closing laws and will be tried in the near future.

W. H. McCord's smiling countenance would be highly welcome in moving picture circles of Kansas City, as the result of recent developments. Mr. McCord recently appeared on the scene with a large roll of real money and an ambition to become a moving picture exhibitor. He leased the Junction theater at 915 Spruce street, ordered a contractor to remodel it, arranged with a local exchange for service and hired the regulation number of operators, cashiers and ticket sellers, not to mention musicians. With everything in readiness for the opening, Mr. McCord disappeared.

The Willis Wood has a seating capacity of 2,500.

The Crawford theater, of Wichita, Kan., is the latest to turn from legitimate to moving pictures. E. L. Marthing, manager of the house, announced the change would be permanent, if desired by his patrons.

Frank L. Newman, president and manager of the Royal Theater Company, has announced that the new house will be ready for the public early in June, probably between the first and fifth of the month. The Royal has secured exclusive rights in the business district for "A Million Dollar Mystery," a serial in twenty-three parts. The feature is being booked in Missouri by the Syndicate Film Corporation which recently opened a branch in Kansas City under the management of Sol Berman. N. H. Spitzer is assistant manager. Interest is being aroused in the feature here by the offer of $10,000 to the person solving the mystery before the final reels are shown. Mr. Newman will run the pictures three days of each week at the Royal, devoting the latter part of the week to single reels, according to present intentions.

KENTUCKY.

PACKED houses have brought joy to Louisville exhibitors in the past two weeks, the theatrical season having closed and the park season having hardly got under way. The parks will not hurt business for some time, it is figured, and again street construction is complicating the problem of getting from home to one of the more popular of these summer time resorts. Capacity business, in the down-town, as well as in the neighborhood theaters, is the rule just now.

Incorporators of the Crescent Amusement Company, recently incorporated with a capital of $3,000 to build a motion picture theater in Crescent Hill, a residence section in the extreme eastern part of Louisville, made peace with the churches of the neighborhood only when they agreed to give no Sunday performances. Announcement of the intention of the promoters of the house to open in Crescent Hill was met with a storm of objections, and later by organized opposition. H. R. Whiteside, one of the incorporators and owner of the majority of the stock, had several conferences with those who were leading the fight against the theater and, after agreeing to dispense with Sunday performances, overcame the objections. Similar situations are noted in other sections of the city, especially in the residence sections where the church-going element is large, the objections being usually centered on the Sunday shows and vaudeville, and promoters are said to be considering adopting the Crescent Hill idea.

Abel played in the original cast which made such a success in the legitimate houses a short while ago. The film kept the house laughing from the time the show started at the Majestic.

W. B. Wheeler, an optician who has been connected with the jewelry store of Charles C. Wright & Company, Louisville, for some time, has purchased the Columbia theater, that city, from W. A. Kinney of the Princess Amusement Company, and has given up his profession to take charge of it. Exhibitors of Appleton made a request of the city council that the fee for moving picture houses be reduced from $50 to $10 a year. The mayor made a recommendation that a reduction to $25 be made, but did not receive sufficient support and the matter was held over. The mayor thought the present fee too high when pool rooms and bowling alleys were not taxed. In the course of the hearing the statement was made that a fee was imposed upon amusement places so that the city would be able to have jurisdiction over a skating rink against which complaint had been made because of the music on Sunday; threat to revoke licenses is the common club used by city officials. Incidentally it came out that the rink will not renew its license after July 1 and the motion picture houses are blamed for putting it out of business.

City officials in Pine Bluff, Ark., who were confronted with the Sunday picture show problem, referred the matter to the Ministerial Association. The association was decided in its stand. "We cannot, under any circumstances, afford to become sponsors for the operation of the picture shows or any other form of secular amusements on the Sabbath. We believe that such things are contrary to the spirit and letter of the Bible and that they are prohibited by the laws of our state. We are profoundly convinced that the best interests of society will be preserved by a strict observance of the sanctity and authority of the Christian Sabbath. De are not unmindful of the special plea which is made in this connection for the laboring classes, who it is claimed are pleading for the privilege of Sunday amusements. Our observation and experience have led us to believe that only a very small per cent. of the laboring people care for these things on the Sabbath. But if we are mistaken in this conclusion, it is still true that in seeking to preserve the sanctity of the Sabbath, we believe, we are protecting the most sacred interests and rights of the laboring man. We beg to remind any who are disposed to offer criticism that if the Sabbath should cease to be a 'holy day' it soon would cease to be a 'holiday.' Only by maintaining the divine authority and sanctity of the Sabbath can men restrain the greed of employers, who even now are clamoring for a seven-day week at the hands of their employes." The association further stated its belief that there was no attempt upon the part of the council to shift the responsibility to the shoulders of the preachers, but a sincere desire to ascertain the sentiments of those who were supposed to stand as the representatives of the moral and religious sentiments of the community.

THE opening of the new Garden Theater, on Locust street between Sixth and Seventh streets, in Des Moines, May 4, was marked by one of the most pretentious advertising stunts ever conducted in connection with a new moving picture theater in Iowa. The second section of an evening paper, four pages on green paper, the preceding evening the opening was devoted to a description and advertising of the house, and of the advertising of the firms who constructed and furnished the building. THE charge that His Majesty's Theater had shown pictures without a license was dismissed by Judge Lanctot. The Famous Players' Company's five-reel subject, "The Port of Missing Men," was shown with great success at the Strand for three days beginning May 18th. The Canadian Cinematograph Co., Ltd., is being re-organized. The lighting in their studio at Longuenit is excellent and, with an exterior lot of 84,000 square feet, they have premises to be proud of. A new theater, which will be one of the finest and largest in Monteral, is to be erected immediately in the eastern end of the city, according to an announcement made by Messrs. A. Paul Keith and E. F. Albee, owners of the Imperial Theater here. The new theater will cover a ground space of 25,000 square feet, and will have a seating capacity of between 3,500 and 4,000. The Imperial covers only 16,000 square feet, and seats some 2,100, so that the new structure will be almost twice as large. The method of construction will be identical with that of the Imperial, and in every way the new theater will be an ornament to the city. The house will be under the management of H. W. Conover who is also manager of the Imperial, and the general policy will be the same, high class features being shown, with French entertainers instead of performers appealing to English audiences. A Hope-Jones Unit Orchestra, similar to that which has proven such a success at the Imperial, will be installed. Work will be rushed on the structure and it is hoped to have it ready for opening in the fall. The erection of this theater marks a further step in the development of the Canadian field by Messrs. Keith & Albee, as it will be the third house owned outright and operater by them in Canada, the others being the Imperial in Montreal and a theater of the same name, construction and policy in St. John, N. B.

A number of changes, considerably strengthening the position of the Board of Moving Picture Censors of the Province of Quebec, are contained in the amendments recently passed by the Lieutenant-Governor in Council, and which were delivered to the Board last week. The decision of the full board is made final, and a special clause has been inserted in the act, forbidding film owners to make any modifications in their films before submitting them for censoring. A source of considerable trouble to the censors in the past has been the practice of some exchange men of cutting from a film, features which were most likely to be passed. After the modified film had been passed they then inserted the portions they had cut out. Questioned on this point G. M. Sinn, who, in the absence of Sheriff Lemieux is acting chairman, admitted that this practice had been prevalent for some time. The censors, he said, first discovered it by the disconnected nature of some of the stories. There often appeared to be something missing. On examination it was found that portions had been cut out of some films. Later complaints would come in that objectionable films were being shown, and when they were recalled, it would be found that portions had been inserted. To stop this, the board applied for and obtained a clause which states that "the films submitted must not be modified befor the examination. If the board approves them with certain modifications, these modifications shall be made by the board itself, with the consent of the applicant, and the portions removed shall remain in the archives of the board so long as the film shall be in use in the Province. They shall be returned to the owner only upon the withdrawal of the authorization.

The change regarding appeals is also of importance. There has been on one or two occasions some trouble on this question, and an appeal could be made to the Lieutenant-Governor in Council. A new clause provides that "when the board sits without all the members being present, and refuses authority to use a film, the person interested may appeal from such decision to the full board..... The ruling upon such appeal by the full board shall be final....." It is further provided that every person making use of such a film before the appeal or after the appeal if the prohibition is maintained or making use of a portion of such film or of a film which has not previously been submitted, shall be guilty of an offence, and liable to fine or imprisonment, the confiscation of the film, and the cancellation of his license.

The board of censors will in future "authorize or prohibit any film, after examination, or modify it with the consent of the applicant." This is a concession to the film manufacturers, giving them the right to refuse to have a film cut. In the event where there are features that the board objects to, the entire film will be prohibited and returned.

The word "film," is also defined by the amended act as meaning any subject represented on a strip not exceeding 1000 ft. in length. In the case of multiple-reel subjects each reel shall be considered as a distinct film. The approval of the board must appear on each film.

A notice printed in French and English must be conspicuously posted in the lobby of every photplay theater stating that only approved pictures are shown.

An idea of the competition existing between picture houses in Montreal, at the present time, may be gleaned by the following: Some time ago, a building was erected by a Mr. Stockwell, on Bleury St., not very far distant from the Imperial and the Tivoli. Mr. Stockwell, having intended it for a garage, abandoned that idea, and offered it for sale. Immediately, Marcus Loew cast his eye on the property, and overtures were made on his behalf for the purchase of the Stockwell site and the ground on which the Tivoli is built, the figure mentioned being $39 a sq. ft., or $1,400,000 in all. Meanwhile, Messrs. Paul Keith & E. F. Albee, of New York, the owners of the Imperial, did not relish the idea of nearby competition from Marcus Loew, and they quickly entered into negotiations with Mr. Stockwell for the taking over of his lease and his partly-erected building. Mr. Stockell closed with their offer, accepting $10,000 for his surrender of the lease and being reimbursed for his expenditures upon the building.

Naturally, it was not to the interests of Messrs. Keith & Albee to put in moving picture in the new building as a counter-attraction to the Imperial, and they cast about for some other profitable purpose to which it may be devoted. The result is a dance hall.

Mr. Herring, manager of the Mount Royal, is gaining in popularity every day, partly because of his good program but still more on account of his nice disposition. After every show in the evening he has a little chat with the audience and fairly captures their hearts. In announcing the coming of "Brewster's Millions," he told his patrons that "if anyone has a million dollars that they want to get rid of just come to the show and we'll show you how to get rid of it.

Simplex

$300 on and after June 1st, 1914

When the Simplex machine was placed on the market over three years ago, its list price was fixed at $275. Since then, from time to time, expensive additions have been made which have greatly improved it.

When Simplex first entered into competition with the then established makes of machines, the trade recognized that it set a higher standard in design, materials and workmanship than had ever been known before in motion picture machine construction.

Simplex Quality is responsible for our present large business necessitating 25,100 sq. ft. of floor space and 250 men to make enough machines to fill our orders.

Simplex Quality is responsible for the wonderful reputation and demand achieved by the machine in North and South America, Europe and the Orient.

Simplex Quality has forced improvements in other makes of machines which suffered much by comparison.

Simplex Quality will be maintained by the makers of the machine, and in order to do so and give the exhibitor a machine which for month after month is absolutely dependable, free from break-downs and excessive wear, and projects as good a picture after 18 months' use as it does when new, it is necessary to now advance the list price $25 (effective June 1st, 1914).

If you are not personally acquainted with Simplex Quality write at once for our new Catalog A.

LICENSED FILM STORIES

ESSANAY.

JANE (June 9).—Because her father breaks her engagement to a young man, Jane, a spoiled girl of luxury, retires to a country hospital of which her father is a director, in order to sulk and give vent to her feelings. She and her father have many tilts over her stubbornness, and Jane is perpetually victor. Her father discharges the flirtatious hospital superintendent one day, and that worthy leaves, taking with him the entire staff and leaving the hospital isolated and cut off from the world. That evening, the "red-haired person," the new superintendent, arrives and his experiences with the hungry patients, not to mention the bad-tempered Jane, serve as a background for a most delightful little comedy. Suffice to say, Jane, for once in her life, meets her match in the "red-haired person," but she rather enjoys being bossed, and an ultimate midnight episode in which she is the moving factor, brings father, the next morning at dawn with three autos loaded with assistance, only to burst in on the greatest surprise of his life. But we'll not discuss it here.

THIS IS THE LIFE (June 10).—Farmer Stebbens and his son, Hiram, attend a convention in New York City, and while there become acquainted with two chorus girls, who lead them a merry chase, which costs the two rubes considerable. Mrs. Stebbens writes a letter to her husband to hurry home to feed the cows and chickens, but hubby, thoroughly enjoying himself, calls her on long distance, telling her to do it herself. The following evening, the two men with the chorus girls are having the time of their lives in a prominent cafe, when wifey walks in and starts a lot of trouble, forcing her husband and son to return to the country, where she stands over them with club in hand, singing "This is the life."

THE SNAKEVILLE VOLUNTEER (June 11).—The news of the war just reached Snakeville and Slippery Slim decided that he could be of service to his country. The fever spreads fast and Mustang Pete decides to go, but his wife is very much against it. The screamingly funny incidents that occur in this story are delightfully entertaining.

BRONCHO BILLY AND THE MINE SHARK (June 13).—William Young and his daughter, Mildred, settle in the West, with the intention of investing their money in a mine. True Boardman, a mine shark, knowing that Young will be easy money, salts the mine and sells it to them. Some time later Broncho Billy meets Mildred and the two become infatuated with each other. Broncho discovers that Young's mine has been salted, so after telling him so, they plan to give the mine shark some of his own medicine, and consequently sell the re-salted mine to Boardman, realizing three thousand dollars more than that had paid for it. Broncho Billy wins the heart and hand of the pretty Mildred.

THE SONG IN THE DARK (Special—Two parts—June 12).—It was only natural that Angela and Richard should become engaged. They were children together and had lived for one another. Their love was the true and undying love, that had been born to live forever. Angela loved nature, and when a bird vender stopped her on the street one sunny afternoon, she unhesitatingly purchased a canary and asked the man for a card, that she might recommend him to her friends. That night, Angela was awakened by the singing of the canary, and could not understand why the bird should be so free-hearted and merry that late hour. Her discontentature was genuine, when she discovered that the bird was blind, and the next morning found her at the bird vender's home, seeking an explanation. She learns that all the birds are blind—that they are blinded on purpose—that they sing better thus and that it is easier to sell birds that have excellent singing quality. She becomes furious to think that such an inhuman act could be inflicted upon the innocent creatures, and has the vender arrested. Her brother, George, a promising young attorney, prosecutes the case and the Italian vender is dogged in court.

The day had been set for the wedding. Their new home to be was in readiness. Angela meets with an accident, which costs her eyesight. Would Richard continue to love her would he forget that he had asked her to become his wife. The loss of her eyesight was nothing compared to the infinite love she bore in her bosom. He was all and all to her. The dark hours spent in the lonely room with the canary as her only companion, helped to cheer her at times and she often wondered why he was so happy. She was blind—never to see God's light again. The bird had long forgotten that it had ever seen the light and he chirped on merrily, in time making Angela forget her affliction. The newspapers printed an article and, the vender seeking communion, begged her forgiveness on his knees. His heart softened and he prayed that she might get better. One evening, as the bird sat on his perch, singing gaily, she stole softly down the carpeted stairs, into the living-room. Richard was there, playing chess with George. Angela found her way to the piano and as the strains of music reached Richard's ear, he whispered, "'Tis Angela," and he crept softly to her side, and said "It is I, who am blind. I love you."

GEORGE KLEINE.

THE TRAP-DOOR CLUE (Special—Two parts—Celio—June 9).—Penniless after he has squandered his foster daughter's fortune, which he has held in trust, Martin becomes the leader of a gang of counterfeiters who flood the country with spurious currency. Detective Sims is assigned to the case and immediately begins operations.

The subterranean den in which the headquarters of the band is located, is carefully protected by a series of trap-doors and pitfalls, and into one of these tumbles Lieutenant Tom Gordon, who is paying attentions to Martin's foster daughter in spite of the counterfeiter's objections.

Sims, who has secured employment as the Martin's gardener, but who as yet has been unable to locate the presses upon which the false banknotes are printed, is attracted by the young man's cries for help. By following the "trap-door clue" he is able to capture the gang, expose their operations and pave the way to a happy marriage of the two young people.

KALEM.

NINA OF THE THEATER (First of the Alice Joyce series—Special—Two parts—June 8).—Nina secures a position with a theatrical company through Paul's influence. The two fall in love and become engaged. Paul is stricken with an illness which necessitates expensive treatment. Nina learns that $1,000 is offered to the person who will submit to an experimental operation which may mean permanent disfigurement. To save Paul's life, his sweetheart takes up the offer.

Brent, the surgeon who performs the operation, falls in love with Nina. To part the lovers, he informs Paul, who later calls to inquire about Nina, that she has lost her beauty forever. Brent also intercepts Paul's letters, causing the girl to believe that he no longer loves her. When Nina recovers, she finds that her beauty is unmarred. Brent asks her to be his wife. Impelled by gratitude, Nina marries him. Later, the doctor resigns from the hospital staff and engrosses himself in experimental work. He utterly neglects Nina. Brent's conduct finally becomes such that his wife leaves him and returns to the stage. The actor who portrays the leading role in Nina's company is injured. Meldon, the manager, sends for Paul to take the injured man's place. The former sweethearts are thunderstruck when they face each other once more. In the explanations that follow, Nina learns of her husband's treachery.

Brent's mind becomes unbalanced as the result of overwork. He cunningly plans to send for Nina and kill her when she returns. The girl falls into his trap and comes in answer to his letter. Realizing she has a madman to deal with, Nina frantically runs down the flight of stairs in her attempt to escape. Brent, following, trips and hurtles over the banisters to the floor below. When Nina fearfully places her hand over his heart, she finds that her husband is dead.

THE QUICKSANDS (Special—Two parts—June 10).—Captain Lanning and Lieutenant Osborne are stationed at an army post in the Philippines. Lanning conceives a deadly hatred toward Osborne when the latter wins Gladys, General Fields' daughter. The officers are sent to the southern end of the island with a detachment of men. After pitching camp for night, Osborne and Lanning go for a stroll. Osborne steps into a bed of quicksand while crossing a stream.

Lanning jeers at the man, who is being drawn to a horrible fate, after which he returns to camp and announces his rival's death. Bonita, a Philippino girl, hears Osborne's cries, and comes to the rescue. Some of her tribe aid her. She saves the man's life a second time, leaving the natives discovering him to be a soldier, try to bolo him. Lanning returns to the post and tells of Osborne's death. Gladys is prostrated. The thought of his awful offense preys upon Lanning's mind. The man finally goes insane and rushes into the jungle.

Osborne is kept prisoner by the natives. Bonita aids him and accompanies the white man in a dash for freedom. Lanning comes to the bed of quicksand where he believes Osborne to have perished. The man leaps into it. There Osborne and Bonita find him. They save him from the horrible death in the nick of time. Discovering Osborne's escape, the Philippinos pursue. Meanwhile, the shock of seeing his supposed victim overwhelms Lanning. The man gradually recovers his mind. The Philippinos come up and a desperate battle ensues. Soldiers, attracted by the firing, come to the rescue and beat the savages off. A shot strikes Bonita, killing her. Gladys, overjoyed at finding her sweetheart returned from the dead, throws herself in his arms. Knowing Lanning's remorse, Osborne takes him by the hand and forgives him.

THE SQUAW'S REVENGE (June 13).—Black Crow, who is friendly to the whites, and Lame Wolf, who urges the tribe to massacre the miners in a settlement nearby, engage in a knife duel. Nekoma, Black Crow's squaw, is attracted by the sound of the combat. She arrives just as her brave is slain. Like a tigress, the squaw springs toward Lame Wolf and attempts to knife him. Her tribesmen seize her and frustrate the attempt. Admiring the woman's spirit, Lame Wolf announces his intention of making her his squaw upon his return from the warpath.

That evening, Nekoma steals out of camp with her child. Later, the two are saved by Dan, a settler, and his wife, just as they are about to perish of thirst. Nekoma warns Dan that her people intend to kill the whites. Dan places the squaw and her papoose in his prairie wagon and drives furiously to the settlement.

Dan gives the alarm. As the result, when the Indians make their attack, they are ambushed and slain. The victorious miners shower their thanks upon Nekoma. Lame Wolf, who was stunned during the fight, recovers. He resolves to avenge the death of his tribesmen by stealing upon the miners and killing them while they are asleep.

Nekoma, sleeping under Dan's wagon, hears the cautious footsteps of Lame Wolf. Creeping from under the wagon, she comes upon the Indian just as he is about to kill Dan and his wife. Before Lame Wolf can accomplish his foul design, the squaw plunges her knife through his heart. The man's death cry awakens Dan and the settlers. The squaw pays no heed to expressions of gratitude. Bending over the body of her husband's slayer, she spurns it with her foot.

THE BOX CAR BRIDE (June 12).—Determined to put a stop to the hopping of freight trains by hobos, President Gilmore issues an order that all persons caught unlawfully riding on the road's freight trains are to be placed under arrest. A reward of $5 is offered for every arrest made. Gilmore's son, Harry, loves Ruth, one of the office stenographers. The father objects to the love affair. Resolved to have their own way, the lovers motor to a village twenty miles away, where they are married. In his exuberance, Harry gives the minister all the money he has.

On the way home, the gasoline gives out. A country storekeeper to whom Harry applies for gasoline, refuses to trust the boy. The lovers are finally compelled to trudge toward home. An open box-car gives Harry an idea. He and Ruth get into the car, which is headed for their town. Bill, a freight conductor, sees the two get into the car. Thinking of the reward, he closes the door. At the end of the run he hands them over to a railroad detective, together with a couple of hoboes whom he has caught.

The newly-weds and the hoboes are taken to the railroad office. There, the indignant husband demands the use of the phone and calls up his father. At first, Gilmore, busy, refuses to answer the phone. When he learns of Harry's predicament, he comes over on the run. The father almost explodes when he learns of how Harry and Ruth have taken matters into their own hands. However, their predicament appeals to his sense of humor and the man forgives them. The hoboes seize this opportunity to make a dash for freedom. Bill, about to go after them, is halted by Gilmore, who is in a magnanimous mood. Thereafter, hoboes and other gentlemen of leisure find themselves unmolested when stealing rides on Bill's train.

REAPING FOR THE WHIRLWIND (June 5).—Bill Heaney, who owns the "Whirlwind," a country paper, is in sore financial straits. Just as his creditors are about to foreclose, Bill meets Blanche, an old friend, who is stranded. Blanche offers to help him. Bill's creditors fall easy victims to the wiles of the girl, who poses as his niece. She promises to wed each one, upon condition that she get $100 in advance. Word of Bill's "niece" spreads about town and the men flock to pay their subscriptions. The treasury filled, Bill takes off his coat and scrawls a sign telling the victims how they have been stung. The plot is discovered, however, and Bill and Blanche are lugged off to jail. Once more Blanche brings her fascinating powers into play and by trapping the jailer in one of the cells, escapes with Bill. But an awful jolt awaits the plotters as they trudge down the track toward far-distant Broadway. When Bill, chuckling, reaches into his pockets for the money, he discovers that he has left it in the coat which hangs in the "Whirlwind" office.

A TRIP TO MT. LOWE (June 5).—Within the memory of a man, a trip to the summit of Mt. Lowe was considered an extra-hazardous feat. To-day, however, few tourists in California fail to include the trip in their itineraries. An inclined railway which takes the traveler up 3,000 feet to Mt. Echo Station, is first stage of the journey. It is here the Mt. Lowe Observatory is situated. Then comes a trip on pony back and finally a long ride on an electric trolley car which brings the tourist to Inspiration Point. The vista before the eye is of superb grandeur. The observer can easily see Los Angeles which is fully fifty miles away.

BIOGRAPH.

DEATH'S WITNESS (June 1).—In the morning the father was found dead. The son was asleep upstairs. His telltale shoes indicated a trip to the river, where stolen goods were found, among them a picture of his sweetheart. A letter on the dead man told of frequent quarrels with his son, yet subsequent events proved the young man was not the guilty one.

THE IDIOT (June 4).—At the death of his child, Norton, his life shattered, was dominated by a lasting hate for the physician, who was unable to come to his dying boy. "His child for mine," was his only thought. His chance for vengeance was at hand. Years later, at a critical period of his life, the physician came face to face with his son. Unwittingly each saved the other's life.

CAPTAIN KIDD, THE BOLD (June 6).—Captain Kidd on his treasure chest gets a saucy letter from Gizgs, the police officer. "Hands off the widow Goulash or get a tweaked nose," says the letter. Before the picture is through, Kidd gets so much of the widow and cop, he is more than willing to hand over lady and treasure.

IN THE NICK OF TIME (June 6).—Bomb, the Bust, and Nitro, the Neat, were on their way to rob the bank of Iron County. Now Sheriff Pete had his daughter for an assistant. She kept the peace of the district while he played poker. She fell into the hands of the bank robbers. It looked bad at the bank for her night-watchman lover. But pa's little assistant was not to be baffled by trifles.

EDISON.

THE TANGO IN TUCKERVILLE (June 8).—The trouble started when the New York Lady Manicurists arrived in Tuckerville. The manicurists were three remarkably attractive young women. When they walked along the street, men involuntarily turned and stared at them. Of course this was in no sense the fault of the young ladies, but it did not increase their popularity with the feminine portion of the population to any alarming extent. When the young ladies opened their shop in Tuckerville, Messrs. Henshaw, Jenkins and Simpkins were among the first patrons. Having their hands manicured was a new and pleasant sensation, and the three girls were very easy to look at.

When his mother brought little Willie to the Sewing Circle, and the enterprising child discovered a telescope, things began to brighten up. From the window of the room in which the Sewing Circle met, Willie could see the window of the lady manicurists' establishment. When he gave Mrs. Henshaw the telescope and begged her to see the pretty lady who was holding Mr. Henshaw's hand, Mrs. Henshaw was distinctly interested. Willie, realizing that he had put his foot into it, rushed over and warned his father, who was one of the enthusiastic throng at the manicurists. Thanks to his warning, none of the men was in evidence when the indignant wives appeared.

To revenge themselves on their husbands, the wives immediately started a tango class, to which no male above the age of twenty-five was admitted. The manicurists, no whit daunted, started a turkey-trot temple, entrance to which was denied to all women above the age of twenty-five. The turkey-trot temple did not do anything else but start. On the very first evening, the indignant wives swept down upon it and removed their husbands from the dangerous influence of the beautiful young ladies. A general reconciliation was effected, which resulted in the banishment of the manicurists and the institution of a new club for dancing purposes. One of the by-laws of the club was to the effect that husbands must dance with their wives only.

THE VOICE OF SILENCE (June 9).—The unfortunate fact that Sue Smith was deaf and dumb did not in any way prevent her from being a remarkably pretty girl. So Stephen Gaines thought, at any rate, when he looked up from his telegraph key, and discovered her staring at him through the window. She had gone out that morning to fish, had lost her oars, and had been carried by the tide out to Cliff Island, where the big wireless station, under Stephen's charge, was located. Stephen got some dry stockings and a pair of rubber boots for the shipwrecked girl, gave her a new pair of oars, and sent her home. The next day she came out to see him. A friendship rapidly sprang into being between them, and Stephen found himself looking forward to the visits of the shy little girl with a considerable degree of interest.

Discovering that she could both read and write, Stephen soon taught Sue the wireless code, and occasionally, to her great delight, he allowed her to send some of his less important messages. When Big Tom Curry, Slim Eastman and Maggie Black, unfavorably known to the police of three continents, made their latest and most daring bank robbery in a northern state, they set out in accordance with a preconceived plan for the South. Curry, Eastman and Maggie were by no means ordinary criminals. They had tremendous resources back of them. In this case, they had arranged to have a steam yacht waiting for them off Cliff Island to provide a means of escape from the thoroughly aroused police.

But when the three worthless arrived on Cliff Island, after a motorboat ride from the mainland, and went to the wireless station for the purpose of sending a signal to their confederate in the yacht, they found Stephen reading a reward notice, containing a detailed description of each of them. Without hesitating for a moment, they overpowered Stephen, threw him into the boat and put out to sea. But they reckoned without Sue. Discovering her friend's plight, she sent out a general alarm call on the wireless. The message was received by a passing ship, which pursued and captured the motor boat. The first thing Stephen did when he got back to the station was to send a wireless north, claiming the liberal reward offered for the arrest of the criminals in the name of his little friend, Sue Smith.

ANDY GOES A-PIRATING (Seventh of the Andy series—June 10).—Andy's taste in literature was not particularly good. It ran to paper colored novels with lurid illustrations on the front cover, and dark hints of crime and blood in the titles. His mother caught him reading one entitled "Skinned Alive!" and told him exactly what she would do if she ever found another book of the sort in his possession. Little daunted by so remote a possibility, Andy purchased another dime novel. This one was all about pirates, and Andy, whose highest ambition had previously been to become an engine driver or a highway robber, was lifted into a seventh heaven. He pictured himself as the stern captain of a swift low barque with all sails set in pursuit of a stout merchantman. He hissed curses past the sword which was clenched in his teeth while beautiful captives knelt before him and wept. Zounds! 'Sblood!

At this point, the superintendent of the messenger office boxed Andy's ears and took the book away from him. Andy wreaked a terrible revenge upon him in his imagination—by forcing him to walk the plank. So strong an impression did the wild rover's life make upon Andy that he decided to become a pirate without delay. Accordingly, that afternoon, he and a few chosen spirits "borrowed" a canal boat, and started out on their nefarious career. Oddly enough, their experiences were not precisely similar to those of Kidd, Morgan, and other worthies of the Spanish Main. For instance, when Andy laid his piratical craft alongside a fisherwoman, and with visions of beautiful captives in his head, ordered her to kneel before him, the fisherwoman nearly broke up the entire expedition. Shortly after their escape from her, their bloodthirsty career was abruptly terminated by a couple of policemen in search of river thieves. Andy's mother, called to the river by little Bessie, who had been left out of the piratical venture, because of her lack of ferocious qualities, arrived just in time to give Andy a long-promised whipping.

A WARNING FROM THE PAST (Special—Two parts—June 12).—Arthur Trevor loved two things more than all the rest of the world. One was his wife, Anne, and the other was the hunting. Because Arthur was her sole and only love, Anne was jealous of her husband's other love. Time and again she begged him to give it up, but Trevor, a cool, dauntless rider, laughed her fears to scorn and continued to live up to his reputation of being the most daring rider in the country. The finest of all Trevor's horses was a powerful brute with the inauspicious name of Satan and a variety of vicious qualities thoroughly in keeping with his name. The grooms in the stable feared and hated him. Money could not have persuaded one of them to mount on his back. Yet Trevor, glorying in his own strength and skill, rode him frequently. Anne, knowing how dangerous Satan was, had frequently begged her husband not to ride him and at last, as a result of her constant pleading, Trevor acceded to her wish.

On the day of the great Holiday Fox Hunt, Anne experienced a terrible premonition of danger and started a note to her husband, begging him not to go. Feeling ashamed of her fears, however, she stuffed the note in a green sofa and said nothing. But when she learned that Trevor, despite his promise, had taken Satan from the stable, her fears returned with redoubled force. Her fears were justified. Trevor was killed. Years later, Anne Trevor's granddaughter was married to Phillip Sayre. One morning, Sayre received a note from a friend, inviting him to make a flight in his new aeroplane. Sayre, deeply interested, hurried off to the field.

Left alone on the old green sofa, Anne Sayre experienced the same terrible premonition which had visited her grandmother so many years before. Half unconsciously, she drew a crumpled sheet of paper from the sofa. On it was written:

"I feel that you are in danger, and I long to keep you from it. I know you will be angry but—"

With all her fears crystallized into action, Anne hurried to the field and begged her husband not to attempt the flight. Sayre, in some anger, humored his foolishly anxious wife. But his anger was changed to an entirely different emotion when his friend's aeroplane, tilted in mid-air and fell four thousand feet to utter ruin.

A TERROR OF THE NIGHT (Ninth of the Active Life of Dolly of the Dailies series—June 13).—Mrs. Winslow, a young widow, owned a piece of property known as "Beach House," for which the Union Realty Company were the agents. The money for the rental of the property meant a good deal to Mrs. Winslow, and when her tenants began to grow few and far between, she naturally called on her agents to inquire into the causes. President Bolivar, of the Realty Company, gravely informed her that "Beach House" was haunted. To substantiate his remarks, he showed Mrs. Winslow some newspaper clippings about the reported ghost at the house. Many complaints had been received from tenants and the property was becoming more and more impossible to rent. In short, Mr. Bolivar advised Mrs. Winslow to accept the Realty Company's very generous offer of $10,000 for the property worth $50,000.

Mrs. Winslow thought that her property was worth more and went to consult her friend, Dolly Desmond, the star reporter on "The Comet." Dolly, instantly excited at the prospect of investigating a haunted house, suggested that Mrs. Winslow leave the property to her for the space of a week. Mrs. Winslow made out the necessary papers and then went to Bolivar and told him what she had done. Bolivar, an old enemy of Dolly, immediately planned a trap for her. He arrived at Beach House a little while after Dolly had made herself at home in one of the gray dreary rooms. After his first expression of pretended surprise, he began to make love to her, but the decisiveness of her answer showed plainly that his original plan was useless. So he bowed and took his leave.

Dolly slept that night on a sofa in the front hall in the midst of a number of garden implements which had been stowed there for safekeeping. In the middle of the night, she was awakened by a slight noise. Looking up, a terrible sight met her eyes. A shrouded figure, clad in garments of ghastly white, was coming down the stairs toward her. Instead of shrieking and fainting, Dolly turned the hose on the advancing figure. It halted, wavered, and then ran out of the house and into the arms of Malone, who had just arrived to investigate the anonymous letter. The ghost was, of course, Bolivar, who had chosen this means of attempting to get Mrs. Winslow's property at a low price.

SELIG.

EUGENICS AT BAR "U" RANCH (June 9).—Martha, an old maid, prim, precise and determined, comes to the ranch to reside, armed with a letter of introduction to Boss, stating that she has a fad for eugenics and believes she "can find a perfect mate among the sturdy men of the unspoiled West." She is made welcome, because she is a woman of gifts, and will be a good companion for his housekeeper. She is much given to book reading which specializes in eugenics, and is much interested in the specimens she finds bulking about the ranch house, idling in the woodyards, and simply superb in the saddle. She finally picks out a stalwart cowpuncher and tells him, "You are satisfactory," but when she says, "I am yours," he flees in terror, knocking down everybody in his path. This does not discourage the specialist in eugenics. She finds Jack, another cowpuncher, who is throwing a lazy comrade out of a bunk, and she gives him a personal examination, tapping his teeth, examining his eyes for defects, and then nodding approval over his general condition.

She loses her book, and the cowboys find it and get a few hunches on eugenics. Fearful of attracting her admiration, they disguise themselves as maimed—one with a broken arm, another with a wooden leg, others affecting various injuries. Finally it develops that Martha is wealthy, and Gabe, the best looking cowboy, secures her for a wife. As they start out on their wedding trip the various cripples throw away their fake fixtures and approve the alliance.

THE DOCTOR'S MISTAKE (June 10).—Dr. Caverly, after giving a bachelor dinner in honor of his approaching marriage, returns to his apartment befuddled by too much red liquor. He is awakened by a messenger who comes from his sweetheart, Alice Windom, asking for tablets to relieve her neuralgia. He sleepily secures some from a box on the table, gives them to the butler, and then falls asleep. When he awakens in the morning he is aghast to read the label on the box, "Bichloride of Mercury Tablets." In a frenzy he picks up the telephone and hears that death is imminent at the home of his sweetheart, and to come at once. The sickening belief that the girl he loves is beyond aid, and he had killed her, transforms him into an abject coward. Later in the day he crept near the Windom home, but had not the moral courage to enter it, and when he saw the funeral emblem at the door he left like a murderer, fled from the spot, and began drinking in the hope of drowning memory, becoming a human derelict.

One night as he was dragging his weary steps down the street he saw a man steadily effecting his entrance into a great house. Then the manhood in him quickened. He followed the intruder, intent upon preventing a crime. He entered the dining-room and saw a desperate criminal threatening a beautiful girl with a revolver. In an instant he brought a heavy chair down upon the man' head, and the burglar dropped like a log. The girl, in her intense excitement, had fainted, and Caverly was transfixed with surprise and delight when he looked upon the face of his sweetheart, whom he firmly believed he had killed. When she recovered consciousness he learned from her the truth. It was her mother who had died from an attack of heart disease, after which Alice had come to live with her cousins. His landlady afterward cleared up the mystery of the poison, admitting that she had, in cleaning up, picked up the empty box upon the table and carelessly replaced it with the one containing the mercury tablets.

BOMBARDED (June 12).—Professor McSwat, an inventor of high explosives, has a pet hobby concerning bombs. Luke is in love with his daughter, Nell, and asks for her hand, but shies at the sight of bombs. Knowing his trepidation, the Professor decides to test his courage, which he does in his own parlor with a bomb. Thereupon Luke determines to get even and goes after the Professor in divers ways. He disguises himself and comes in the presence of the Professor lighting a cigarette with a stick of dynamite. The Professor runs for his life, but his path is blocked by a lady Nihilist waving a butcher-knife. The Professor is next captured and bound to a tree and a bomb is placed at his feet. He is nearly wild from suspense, when help arrives in the form of Luke, who fearlessly seizes the bomb and throws it into the woods. It falls near a tramp, who picks it up, examines it carefully, and then breaks it against a rock. It turns out to be a cocoanut, and the hungry "bum" eats the contents with gusto. Luke, who is ingenious, was the man with the bomb, and later naturally captures the Professor's daughter, who assisted him as the Nihilistic lady.

WHEN THE NIGHT CALL CAME (June 13).—When the night call came, it found a young woman struggling with great emotions, the better impulses of her sex battling against the perverted sordid side of her nature. It was the culmination of the biggest game Nell Delaney and her gang had ever undertaken. The girl, in order to land an over-cautious victim, had actually married Karl Kreidt, an unsophisticated young man, who had just come into possession of a large amount of money. He was thoroughly infatuated with the woman, could do naught but plan for her comfort, and so fell into the trap she had devised. Lured into a lonely house at night, he surrendered his fortune to the crooks rather than meet death, never knowing that Nell was the chief plotter. In fact, his last thought was of her, and he sent word to her that he had ruined her future and disgraced himself to save his own miserable life. She, crouching in the next room, had overheard this confession, and the feminine impulse seized her to frenziedly try and right the wrong. She dashed into the room and savagely attacked the men who had robbed her husband. Amazon-like, she rushed into the thick of the fight, revolver in hand, and fought her husband free, both escaping to a waiting automobile outside. She was wounded in the fight, but, during convalescence, confessed all to Karl, to whom she was thoroughly reconciled and was forgiven to lead a happy and a useful life.

MISS RAFFLES (June 1).—On account of an urgent business call, Mr. and Mrs. Leslie hurriedly close their summer home at Hudsonclift and leave with their daughter, Jane, for the city. Bob, their son, decides to visit his parents at Hudsonclift with his friend, Ralph Lyons. Bob and Ralph find the house locked up and, after some reconnoitering, enter through a window. Ralph hurts his ankle and is unable to attend a dance that evening, so Bob goes instead. Jane, on her arrival in the city, finds she has left her necklace in the safe at their summer home, and leaves a note for her mother, saying she is going back for it. Her parents decide to follow her. Jane has forgotten the key of the house, and climbs in a window. In doing so, she knocks over a chair, which Ralph hears. Thinking burglars are trying to break in, he takes Bob's gun and goes cautiously downstairs. He sees Jane kneeling by the safe, and after partly disguising himself, steps up behind her with the peremptory command, "Hands up!" While she is explaining her presence there Bob returns from the dance and sees them through the portierres. Believing both to be burglars, he excitedly rushes out and returns with a policeman and Mr. and Mrs. Leslie, whom he has met on the way. With drawn revolver, the policeman, followed by Bob and his parents, enter the house, where, to their astonishment, they find the two "robbers" sitting on the sofa, talking and apparently quite at their ease. Ordered to throw up their hands, both start with surprise and then burst into laughter. After introductions and explanations, all join in the fun, the police are dismissed and all are soon the best of friends.

THE LAST WILL (Special—Two parts—June 2).—Getting old and feeble, Sir William Foxwoody declares to his daughter and her son his intention of leaving his estate to the son. The mother is overjoyed, but later hears the old nobleman confiding to his ward, Julia Ann Rixby, that he means to make her his heiress. Sir William has seen the lover-like attitude of the young people and writes a third and last will—hiding it behind a portrait of himself. After his death the mother secretly enters the death-chamber, steals the will, leaving all to the ward, and substitutes a forged will, leaving everything to the young man.

The fraud is discovered and the lawyer accuses the mother of having committed the forgery. By accident, he secures possession of the original second will written by the old man.

The lawyer tells her she must inform Julia Rixby by five o'clock that the fortune is hers. The son, dozing behind a screen, overhears the conversation between the lawyer and his mother and sorrowfully confronts them. Julia, who has also learned the truth, rushes in and, seizing the will leaving all to her, tears it up. The lawyer then destroys the false one, leaving none at all. On their way out George's mother sees her father's portrait and vents her rage upon it. In its destruction, the last will is disclosed, which gives the entire property to George—on condition that he marry Julia. The two young people have long been in love and all ends as the old nobleman willed it.

WANTED, A HOUSE (June 3).—Dissatisfied with their narrow city flat, Mrs. Citiman tells her husband they are going to take a small house in the country. He is not enthusiastic, but she insists, and that settles it. After a long ride and a muddy walk, they reach the "house." It looks more like a relic. However, Mrs. Citiman thinks it is all very "rustic" and they take it. On their way back to the station, the floor of the ancient wagon in which they are riding gives way and, stuck fast by the waist, he is obliged to run through the mud. When they move, he gets into more trouble, breaks things and has an awful time trying to paper the walls. His wife finds him hanging to the chandelier, which he grasped as the ladder went from under. The fastenings part and down comes Citiman in a shower of plaster and brasswork. He then tries plumbing. Unfortunately, he connects up the gas pipe with the water pipe. Mr. Citiman turns on the inverted gas light and is drenched with a powerful stream of water. Her husband in the bathroom turns on the faucets in the tub with apparently no results. He lights a match to investigate and both faucets burst into flame. Immediately afterwards there is a tremendous explosion, and Mr. and Mrs. Citimah describe a parabola out onto the front lawn. The house is burning furiously. Citiman saying to himself, "The furniture is insured. I should worry!" With a sly wink clasps his hysterical wife to his bosom while their "beautiful suburban home" burns to the ground.

A FALSE MOVE (June 4).—With the best of intentions, Mr. and Mrs. Baxter, a prosperous couple, at Christmas time, try to make things pleasant for Miss Priscilla and Martha Howard, two poor but extremely proud maiden ladies. They, however, refuse all assistance, saying, "We are not objects of charity." Determined to present them with some warm clothing, Mrs. Baxter plans to invite Priscilla and Martha to her home that evening, while Baxter is to take a bag containing the presents, go to the Howard home and hang it over their fireplace. Unfortunately, he gets the laundry bag by mistake. After entering through a cellar window, with many painful misbaps, he finally locates the room with the fireplace. He hears the women returning and hastily dodges into a closet, taking the bag with him. Priscilla and Martha are astounded at the appearance of their rooms. They hear something in the closet and Baxter makes a noise like a mouse. The women throw a cat into the closet, nearly causing the poor man to collapse. Later, they hear him trying to pick the lock. Deciding there is a man in there, they call for help. The town constable arrives and hauls the intruder out. Baxter tries to explain matters, and to prove his good intentions opens the bag. To his horror, and the indignation of the ladies, he finds only soiled clothes. As he is about to be dragged off to jail, Mrs. Baxter, who has discovered the mistake rushes up and, after explanations, the whole affair is straightened out. The two old maids, appreciating the good intentions of the Baxters, accept their proffered gifts in the spirit in which they are presented.

THE MAID FROM SWEDEN (June 5).—In search of a maid, Mrs. Cook, an aristocratic and extremely proud society woman, goes to an employment agency and hires Luna, fat, awkward and straight from Sweden. The new maid creates quite a stir in the staid and fashionable home of Mrs. Cook. While capering about in her room above, she brings down the ceiling. Mrs. Cook saves her from being discharged and then calls up the plasterer, whose name is John Haines, a widower, and the father of Bert, the chauffeur, in love with Marie Cook, their daughter. John fixes the ceiling, and on his return home finds a note from his son saying he is going to be married and suggests his father follow his example. John tells the news to Luna, proposes to her, and without a second's hesitation, she accepts him. That night, Luna sees Marie and Bert elope and, in her excitement, makes a racket which is heard by Mr. and Mrs. Cook. Mr. Cook thinks it is burglars and holds Luna up with a gun. They find a note left by the elopers, telling of their intention, which adds to the confusion. Next day the elopers return for forgiveness, but Mrs. Cook refuses it. Suddenly Luna bursts in and introduces her husband, John Haines. Mrs. Cook looks disgusted and takes no interest in the matter until John takes his son, Bert, to his fatherly heart. Marie's parents then realize that Haines is Bert's father, and he and Luna are relatives of the Cooks by marriage. Luna is overjoyed, brings wine to celebrate the grand occasion, slaps Mrs. Cook heartily on the back, winding up by seizing Mr. and Mrs. Cook in one huge embrace and giving them both a resounding kiss on the cheek.

TOO MANY HUSBANDS (Special—Two Parts—June 6).—After refusing Arthur Crane, his nephew, the hand of his ward, Dorothy, uncle "tenderly" throws Crane downstairs and insists Dorothy marry his secretary, Chauncey Chilton. She flatly refuses. Chauncey is in reality a crook with a soubriquet of "Double Cross Flynn." Arthur, residing with the Browns, in New York, receives word of Dorothy's engagement to Chilton. He angrily writes to Drothy and his uncle that he has been married a year and sends a photo of Mrs. Brown as his wife. Uncle delightedly telegraphs he is coming with Dorothy and Chilton to visit him. Arthur confesses to the Browns, begging their consent to introduce Mrs. Brown as his wife, and her husband as a boarder, to which they agree. Bauer, a detective, who is on Double Cross's trail, boards with the family. Uncle arrives and insists on christening Brown's baby "Thaddeus," nearly causing a riot. Arthur temporarily forgets he is "married" and makes love to Dorothy. Brown's mother-in-law arrives and makes things hum. Arthur desperately locks Crane in his room until after the christening, when Uncle learns the baby's name is "Marguerite." Mrs. Brown becomes hysterical, Uncle sees her husband comforting her, and tells Arthur his wife is making love to one of the boarders. Chauncey witnesses a love scene between Arthur and Dorothy and tells Uncle. Uncle indignantly tells mother-in-law that the owner of the house was found making love to his ward. Mother drags the Browns into the room and Uncle naturally denies he accused Brown, as he thinks Arthur is the husband and owner. During the mix-up Bauer suddenly identifies and arrests Chilton. In the excitement, the nephew and ward disappear. Uncle receives word they are married and when they return, after explanations all around, Uncle gives them his blessing.

EVE'S DAUGHTER (June 8).—Jean Ware, a girl of sterling character, is employed as a model by Armand Colt, a young sculptor. She meets Richard Cortland, a millionaire, and a friend of Armand's; they fall in love and are married. Jean dares not tell her husband she was Armand's model, as he is known as a reckless fellow. Shortly after their marriage, the sculptor insists that she pose for his latest masterpiece, "A Daughter of Eve." By threatening to tell her husband, he succeeds in getting her to pose for him in secret. At an Exhibition where Armand's work wins first prize, Richard accidentally learns his wife posed for the statue, and confronts the sculptor, who admits the truth. Cortland is furious and tries to strike him. Richard and his wife, after a severe quarrel separate. In his rage and jealousy, he takes a revolver and hurries to the sculptor's apartment, determined to kill Jean if he finds her there. While he is menacing Armand, the bell rings and Richard quickly hides behind the portierres. Jean is admitted and Richard hears her tell the sculptor, "You know I am innocent of wrong, now set me right in my husband's eyes." Deciding he has judged his wife too harshly, Richard steps into the room, only to find she has gone. Fearing what she may do in her present state of mind, he rushes after her, arriving in time to save the girl from plunging into the lake. Jean begs him to let her go, but he presses her to him, begging forgiveness. Her sorrow is changed to gladness, their lips meet in a passionate kiss and both start life anew, with a better understanding of each other.

THE RIGHT OF WAY (Special—Two Parts—June 9).—After mortgaging his estate up to the limit, Lawrence Radford finds himself deeply in debt. John Durban, an unscupulous financier, wants his land for a railroad scheme he is putting through. Radford is offered a ridiculously small sum, and being hard pressed by creditors, is inclined to accept it, but Brixton, his lawyer, advises him to refuse. Durban, learning Brixton is a stumbling block, bribes him to advise Radford to sell. Radford's daughter, Ray, a stenographer, who is engaged to Jack Ramsay, a young lawyer, overhears the conversation, and feeling suspicious of Brixton, induces her father to defer his answer. She tells her lover, and on his advice Radford refuses to sell. Durban then buys up all the mortgages on Radford's estate and threatens legal proceedings.

Jack becomes convinced that Brixton is a traitor to Radford. He tells Ray and she secures a position as stenographer in Durban's office, where she finds evidence of money paid to bribe Brixton, also that a party in Washington is deferring passage of the railroad bill, which will enrich Durban, until the land matter is definitely settled. Durban works on Radford's fears, through Brixton, and Radford decides to sell. Ray sees a letter announcing Radford's intention and, feigning illness, hurries over to Jack's office. Brixton has recognized the girl and tells Durban who she is. Alarmed at the discovery they rush out, with Hartland, his legal advisor, to complete the transaction at once. Radford is about to sign the bill of sale, when Jack rushes in, denounces Durban, Brixton and Hartland, and forces them to buy the land at his price.

THE WIDOW OF RED ROCK (June 10).—A very attractive young widow arrives at Red Rock and, women being exceedingly scarce in that rough mining town, she is heartily welcomed. She opens a little bar, which proves tremendously popular. All the miners fall in love with her, but she shows no favors. Pete and Sandy, two woman-haters, who have been pals for years, quarrel fiercely over her. Rogan, the bad man of the town, tries to get fresh with the widow and she floors him, then shoves him out the door. Rogan receives so much "kidding" over the affair, he makes a bet he will wed the widow within a month. Bringing three of his friends and a Justice of the Peace, Rogan and his pals enter. While the widow is serving drinks, he tells her he is going to marry her. She laughs and he tries to kiss her. The widow promptly "drops" him with a solid right. The others attempt to assist him, but the widow sails in and "cleans up." The Justice, seeing the men come flying out the door, peeks in and sees the supposed widow, revealed in men's clothes. "She" laughs heartily, takes the contents of the cash drawer, hastily packs and just catches the train for the city, leaving a note explaining HE is a "stranded" female impersonator. The miners laugh boistrously, while Sandy and Pete decide they have been a pair of doggasted old fools and shake hands over their renewed friendship.

THE POWER TO FORGIVE (June 11).—Anne, a woman of strong character, who rules the Camp at Dead Horse Gulch, takes care of Pepita, a dancing girl from another town when she arrives on night in a terrible storm. Barker, a gambler, with whom Anne is in love, is struck with the dancing girl's beauty. Later Anne sees Pepita flirting with Barker and bitterly reproaches him.

Pepita dances in the saloon and makes a big hit. Anne is heartbroken when Barker devotes himself to the dancer. Pepita induces him to rob the safe in the saloon and elope with her. They get a large amount of money and stealthily leave the house. Anne sees them and determines that Pepita shall not have Barker. Taking her gun, she rides after them, saying, "I'll find them, and we'll all die together." In the division of the gold, Pepita shows her greed and he disgustedly turns his back on her. She stabs him and flees with the money. Anne finds Barker badly wounded. Filled with love and pity, she brings him home. Anne sees the saloon proprietor, who has discovered the robbery, coming with a posse, and prepares for defence. Barker cries out and she quickly drops to his side. The men are about to seize him when Anne interferes and offers to replace the stolen money. The proprietor refuses the offer, and turning to the crowd, says, "I am ready to call it quits, boys." All go slowly out, leaving Anne and Barker to their assured love and happiness.

THE ACCOMPLISHED MRS. THOMPSON (June 12).—During his wife's absense abroad, Dick Osborne's Aunt Sarah settles their new house for them and employs a housekeeper. John, a friend of Dick's, tells the latter how his wife, after a quarrel, left him and he is unable to find any trace of her. Dick tries to brace him up and invites him out to the new house, when Osborne's bride arrives. Dick and his wife find their new home in charge of a beutaful, elegantly-gowned woman, who apparently does not know her place. She joins in all conversations, passes the cigarettes around, and displays so much familiarity with Dick that Mrs. Osborne's jealousy is aroused. She insists that the housekeeper must go and her husband is summoning sufficient nerve to fire her when John walks in. Dick is almost paralyzed when he sees his friend talking very confidentially to the housekeeper, embrace and kiss her. He is still puzzling over it, when he sees John and the housekeeper leave the house without a word. Next morning, Dick and his wife see them riding in an automobile and later find a note saying, "I left my husband some time ago, secured a position as your housekeeper, and having adjusted our differences, we are now happily reunited." Betty now understands the whole affair, humbly begs her husband's forgiveness and both laugh heartily over their experience with the "Accomplished Mrs. Thompson."

OUR FAIRY PLAY (Special—Two Parts—June 13).—The Payne family of Lonesomeville get up a Fairy Play, founded upon the story of "The Sleeping Beauty," and Helene Payne secures the wealthy Mrs. Wilson's financial support. She is a lady no longer young, but insists upon playing the ingenue lead. Miss Tibbitts, a mournful old maid, is secured for their "Pansense." Willey Finley gives out the parts, while Doctor Heffernan is given the directorship. Most of the actors are decidedly amateurish, the scene painting, effected by Judge Masterson, rather weird, but after some embarrassing and awkward incidents, they struggle through three rehearsals.

The play is carried out as planned. It comes nearly being literally "carried out." One of the fairies carelessly drops her wings and is obliged to step out of line to recover them. Miss Tibbitts mournfully performs a "seductive" dance that falls flat. Prince Charming and the Sister of "Sleeping Beauty" become lost in a "terrible" snow storm. Cupid, in the person of Bud Masterson, flies down to their rescue, and poises for his return flight. The stagehands tending the ropes miss their cue and Cupid is obliged to poise several times. When they do wake up, Cupid is yanked off his feet, while "Beauty's" sister waves him a kiss as he sails upwards. The Doctor, running "The Cave of Magic," is called away on a case, leaving his confederate faithfully carrying out his end of the "magic" entirely unaware his chief is no longer there. Prince Charming rides in on an ancient horse and the animal eats up "Sleeping Beauty's" wig. She faints. Doctor Heffernan returns and steps out onto the stage just as the curtain comes down on his head, while the audience burst into a mighty thunder of applause.

LUBIN.

FIRE! FIRE! (June 6).—Mike Clancy and Pat Murphy work for Sam Duckett who is Chief of the Volunteer Fire Department. They scrap a great deal and Clancy, who is the smaller, gets the worst of it. The chief tells Murphy that the next time they scrap he shall be fired. That afternoon there is another mix up and Clancy hustles off to tell the chief. Now when he is excited, Clancy stutters dreadfully and the least interruption throws him off the track. The moment he manages to stammer out "FIRE" someone asks him where the fire is, and he has to start all over again. The alarm is rung and the crowd gathers while Clancy is still trying to get the speech out. At last the chief warns the crowd back and gives Clancy a chance. His oration is "Fire Murphy, he hit me again." That is all that is necessary. The irate crowd jump for him and Clancy is tied to a pole while the boys play the hose on him.

THE PIE EATERS (June 9).—The entire police force of Hotelsville revel in pie. Regan and Finn, champion eaters, make themselves strong with the pretty servant girls of the town. Regan is very happy when he captures an extra large pie that Rose had ordered for the grocery boy. Rose retaliates by placing a bucket over Regan's head. Rose and Lily, another servant girl, later meet the two cops. Rose sees Finn gossiping with Lily and gets the cold shoulder. The affair merges into a free fight. Regan starts to wipe up the road with Finn. The girls interfere and, after succeeding in separating the men, enjoy a rough and tumble scrap themselves. Regan and Finn, fearing murder, separate the girls. The preacher sees the disgraceful affair and hastens to the police station. The lieutenant and the sergeant quell the riot and get Rose and Lily, and the cops are arraigned to get what the judge will give them.

HE WORE A WIG (June 9).—Major Bowers wants to marry Fay Raymond, and her pa is perfectly willing and even anxious, but Fay wants to marry Jack Cousines almost as much as he wants to marry her. Pa fires Jack out of the house to give the Major a chance when along comes Pa's maiden sister. She wants the Major for her self to win him, but Pa shoulders her out to the back porch and nails her to the steps to keep her there. Fay steals the Major's wig and gives it to Auntie. Auntie coyly demands that the Major redeem it with a kiss. He is catching cold in his bald spot and there seems to be nothing else to do. He kisses her and Pa catches him at it. He will not have the Major playing fast and loose with the entire family and declares that the Major must marry Auntie. The Major breaks away. So does Auntie, who leaves her dress nailed to the stoop. She catches him in the front yard and explains to some friends that she is engaged. That clinches it, and the Major goes home feeling like a man that is to be shot at sunrise. Jack comes and suggests to Fay that the Major sidesteps by announcing that he is already married to his housekeeper. Jack remembers that his housekeeper is black; but the Major is too worried to remember such small trifles as that and grasps the chance. Jack takes the note to Auntie and then gives it to John, the Major's butler and husband of the housekeeper. John decides to do some sleuthing, and chases the Major right into Auntie's arms.

THE CHANGELING (Special—Two Parts—June 10).—When old Dr. Rogers is called to a distant city on a special case and summons young Dr. Delmore to attend one of his patients, the wealthy Mrs. Saunders, Delmore hopes it will prove the beginning of better times for him: that he can gradually build up a practice among the people who can afford to pay large fees and abandon his ill-paying visits to poor patients. Then, too, he can marry Miss Price, the pretty trained nurse with whom he is in love.

The wealthy Mrs. Saunders, whose husband is hastening home from a European trip, is about to become a mother. Delmore makes all arrangements for the event and Miss Price is engaged as nurse. Mrs. Saunders receives a cablegram from her husband saying he had missed the steamer and that his return will be delayed a week. When Mrs. Saunders' baby is born, Delmore is compelled to discover the infant is lacking in vitality but keeps this information from the mother, fearing that worry may interfere with her recovery. The same day, Delmore is called to the bedside o Mrs. Brown, a poor woman, who also gave birth to a son. The woman dies while her husband, whom Delmore has sent to a charitable society with a request for a nurse, is away. Delmore knows Miss Price and learns that the Saunders' baby has died during his absence, but that its mother is as yet unaware of its death. Seeing his opportunity for rich patronage killed at the start, Delmore is crushed, but there comes to him the thought that by changing babies he can do a good thing for all concerned. So the substitution is made. The dead son of Mrs. Saunders is buried with the poor woman while the lusty infant of the dead woman is smuggled into the Saunders' home where Mrs. Saunders holds it fondly to her breast in blissful ignorance that it is not her own.

Delmore's scheme, however, does not prove to be the blessing he anticipated, for it develops that Brown, the father of the changeling, is a hopeless maniac, afflicted with the kind of insanity that nearly always proves hereditary. Delmore discovers this after Mr. Saunders' return and fears to confess the substitution. No one knows but Miss Price, and even she is ignorant of the fact that the changeling's father is a maniac.

Delmore proposes, marries Miss Price and they have a daughter, May. The Saunders rear their supposed son, Edwin, in luxury.

May and Edwin meet at a social college and fall in love. Delmore is horrified in discovering that the boy his daughter wishes to marry is "the changeling" and, unable to give a good reason for his objection to Edwin, can only sullenly refuse to sanction the match. His practiced eye detects in the young man unmistakable symptoms of his heritage. May and Edwin elope and Dr. Delmore's sin comes home to him at last.

Unable to bear the thought of his girl in the arms of a tainted man, Delmore resolves to separate them at any cost. So that night he takes Edwin on an authomobile ride. The auto is struck by an express train. Only two persons ever knew how the accident happened—Dr. Delmore and the "changeling" and their lips are sealed in death.

THE LURE OF THE PIT (Special—Two Parts—June 11).—John Manton, idealist, is ambitious to reform social conditions. His work takes him into the slums where he meets Edith Strong, daughter of John Strong, a Wall Street broker. As Edith's aim in life is akin to John's it is natural that the two being young fall in love. Kuvalda, an old clock maker, is the confident and adviser of both. Kuvalda is a great student. He and John have had many a talk on the subject of Wall Street speculation, and its harmful effect upon the poorer classes. John, who is a grain specialist, agrees with Kuvalda that Wall Street needs reforming. By performing a service for Edith's father, John wins his gratitude. When John and Edith marry, Strong presents John with a seat on the exchange. John considers it his chance to work the reforms talked of by himself and Kuvalda. John refuses to co-operate in a deal with other brokers. The brokers ridicule him by saying he lacks nerve. This declaration stings him and just to show them that he has nerve he joins them in one deal which he carries to unexpected success. The fever enters his veins and he forgets his purpose to reform "the street." In a year he is the leader of a clique bent on cornering wheat. The price of bread rises and the poor suffer. Edith, his wife, pleads in vain for John to remember his promises. Kuvalda's remonstrances are unavailing. John is money mad. His opponent in the deal is Van Sloan, another broker, who had desired Edith for his wife. The great wheat corner is almost complete, when Van Sloan discovers an unexpected source of supply. He lacks funds, however, with which to secure the wheat. Edith learns of the situation and hands Van Sloan the money which she had meant for her own husband. But his ruin is financial only. His honor, and peace are restored. With Edith he starts life anew.

CLAIM NUMBER 3 (June 12).—John Clifton is prospecting in Nevada. Lafe Brown is also in the same mountain. Clifton finds a spot rich in gold. He stakes out the claim and starts for the recorder's office. He has not gone very far before he collapses with a case of mountain fever. Brown finds Clifton, and the two men meet for the first time. Brown starts to help Clifton, but when the latter tells him of his gold find, Brown determines to take advantage of Clifton's condition and steal his claim. Asking for a drink, he pours the water from the canteen to the ground. Brown goes to the claim, tears off Clifton's card and substitutes his own. Before death comes, Clifton's anger gives him strength to write a note to his son Dick, in New York. He tells Dick, Brown has left him to die after jumping his claim, which he has called "Number Three" and urges Dick to find Brown. He hides the note in the bottom of his knapsack.

Returning, Brown finds Clifton dead. He discovers a leather card case in Clifton's shirt requesting that in case of death Clifton's belongings should be sent to his son. Brown reports to the sheriff that he found Clifton dead. He turns over Clifton's knapsack and records the claim as his own. When the package containing Clifton's knapsack arrives in New York, Dick is not at home.

Two years later he returns after a trip through Europe. When he finds the note, the boy swears that he will kill his father's murderer, and goes to Nevada. There he learns that Brown is now a wealthy man living with his daughter in Los Angeles. Dick locates Brown and after a year of patient scheming Dick becomes Brown's secretary under an assumed name. He meets Dorothy and has come to love her. He overheard the family physician tell Brown that his heart is weak and that he must be careful to avoid any sudden shock. He resolves to kill Brown indirectly, that is, frighten him to death. He mails a letter in a disguised hand telling Brown that his hours are numbered and that when he sees "Number Three" he will answer for the death of Clifton. When Brown reads the letter he is terrified. In his library he finds the clock stopped at the hour of one and it occurs to him that this must be the first of a series of warning numbers. Next he discovers that it is April 2nd. Brown determines to go East to escape the danger which he believes is hovering over him. With Dick and Dorothy Brown goes to the railroad station, when about to board the train, the porter hangs a sign on the back of the rear platform. The sign reads "Number 3." Brown's heart fails at the sight of the fatal number and he lurches forward into the arms of Dick and Dorothy. Dick, awed by the vengeance of Providence, protectingly puts his arm about Dorothy.

Not Alone a Base-Ball Picture, but a Real World Tour for Everyone, Young or Old

Some of the scenes secured by the Pathé cameraman on this trip were obtained only at great personal risk. During the storm on the Pacific the water washed right over the camera, giving the most startling, realistic picture. Women in Japan coal the ship faster than it can be done with the most modern machinery. Human monkeys in New Guinea throw down cocoanuts from the tree top to the players.

The players travel on camels to play the game at the Sphinx. The Pope receives them in private audience. The King of England honors the game with his personal attendance. The BUG rides the brake beams and stows away to get to the game but he is at every one. One of the players nearly marries a million dollar widow.

The pictures are one continued string of interesting features showing the most wonderful scenery and the great world famous events witnessed by the players. One of these was the great carnival of Nice in which the players took part.

The Perils of Pauline

READ THIS—It Means Much To You

The first episode of The Perils of Pauline is pulling the crowds just as much NOW, although it is more than eight weeks since the first release. Last Thursday in the Avon Theatre in Newark the crowds were lined up for hours waiting to get in. This in spite of the fact that there had been a new theatre opened within a few doors of the Avon with a full programme for the opening of big features. The first episode was released in Newark more than eight weeks ago and yet this theatre could outdraw the new one. Learn a lesson from this and get Pauline right away. There is a tremendous "patron Pulling" power in this series that means big box office receipts. The manager of one of our branches writes "The first episode will be a big puller in my territory for three months."

Wholesome Pictures Versus Scavenger Pictures

Some people go to see "scavenger" pictures from choice. Some have it forced on them when they go to what they think is a good theatre. The first class are "Floaters," the second class never go back to that theatre. Pictures do not need to be unclean to be interesting. Nor do they need to be uninteresting to be clean. There are some manufacturers at the present time who think that a picture to "get over" must appeal to the baser qualities in the minds of men and women. But no manufacturer ever made or will make for his firm a lasting name and a success who follows this line of endeavor. The Eclectic Company have made for themselves a name for putting out only that class of pictures which are clean and wholesome and yet which carry a "Punch" in every reel.

The STAIN

A Dramatization of the Great Novel by Forrest Halsey and Robert Davis

The Stain is the first of the American multiple reel pictures made specially for us by Pathé. It is a masterpiece in every way. The Play is a dramatization of the great novel by Forrest Halsey and Robert Davis. The parts are played by Edouard Hose, Thurlow Bergen, Virginia Pearson, Eleanor Woodruff, Sam Ryan and others of great ability. You are probably familiar with the story of the bank clerk who has ambition to become a great lawyer but is prevented by poverty. He steals some of the bank's cash and deserts his wife and small child. Later after becoming a judge, and having remarried under the impression that his former wife is dead, he is called upon to try his daughter on a framed-up charge. He is being very severe but just as he is about to pass sentence he is recognized by the wife he had deserted and his infamous past is laid bare.

The story itself is very strong and the critics who have seen the finished picture predict a very hearty reception. There is not a slow minute in the whole six reels. The dramatic incidents are exceptionally strong. You will be protected if you send your order to us now.

VICTOR.

DISENCHANTMENT (Two Parts—May 22).—Flo, along with most of the population, is lionizing Heinrich Von Berger, a tenor of renown, much to the chagrin of her sweetheart Harry. Coals are heaped upon the fire when Harry calls on Flo and sees the tenor's photographs in every corner of the parlor. His annoyance is added to when Flo tells him she has received invitations for herself and her friend, Betty, to attend a private recital of the tenor, and that Harry and his friend, Charles, must escort Betty and herself to the affair.

On the night of the recital Flo and Betty are greatly annoyed by the actions of Harry and Charles, who poke fun at the tenor's singing. They leave in a huff; the girls declare they will never speak to the boys again. Harry, realizing now that Flo's admiration for the tenor is greater than he thought, tries to apologize for his prank, but to no avail.

One day Flo notices a help wanted ad in the paper for a maid and a butler in the tenor's home. She decides to apply for the position that she can be near her idol. Flo sends for Betty and tells her of her plans. Betty tries to discourage her. Flo insists, and borrowing one of her own maid's dresses, she asks Betty to accompany her and wait outside while she applies. If she is not out in fifteen minutes Betty is to know that she is accepted. On the way over they are met by Charles. He determines to follow and see what's up. Standing a distance away from the artist's home he sees Flo enter. When Betty, who has waited the time limit, approaches him, he asks her for an explanation. She tells Charles all about it, and shows him the ad for the butler and the maid. Charles loses no time in telling Harry of Flo's adventure and Harry decides to apply for the position as the butler. He is accepted. Harry's appearance in the house is distasteful to Flo, and only tends to widen the breach between them. He pokes fun at her awkward efforts to impersonate a maid. Harry lays plans to bring her in conflict with the eccentric German. He seizes his chance, when Flo, in her first attempt to cook, is putting her best foot forward to please. On the stove is a great pot of soup boiling, and Harry, unseen by Flo, drops handsful of salt into it. Flo takes it into the dining room. The wife pours out the soup. Flo watches her idol with eyes wide open hoping her humble efforts will please. He drinks a spoonful of the briny fluid and nearly chokes. Flying into a terrible rage, he demands of his wife to know who prepared the dinner, and when she points to Flo, he lets loose a volley of biscuits at her. Flo, in great fright, runs from the room. The artist dashes after her with the carving knife. Harry, rushing to the rescue, disarms the German. Flo dashes out of the house and home, followed by Harry. Her opinion of the great singer is now changed. She and Harry go to the parlor and throwing all the photographs of her former idol on the floor, they do an Indian dance on his long-haired head as Flo vows never to love anyone else but her sane hero, Harry.

POWERS

THE UNDERTOW (June 8).—In the underworld of New York, a girl, born of shame and reared within its environments, endures the brutal usage of "Strong Arm" Riley, a crook, who sends her into the streets to steal. Upon the opening of the story she returns with a small amount of money. "Strong" takes her change and reprimands her upon her slim success, leaving her to join a drinking crowd in a nearby dance hall. The girl follows and finds him in the arms of another. She openly upbraids him and is thrown by "Strong" into the street.

Faint with injury, she is picked up by an old apple woman and taken to her humble home. Through the kind influence of her benefactor, she awakens to new and higher things in life. She secures honest employment. She forms the acquaintance of Jerry, an honest teller, who is accustomed to dine where she is employed as waitress. "Strong" in the meantime, is picked up by a detective and sent "up the river" on an old charge. The friendship between Jerry and the girl ripens into love. Hungering for a chance at life, the girl marries Jerry without telling her former life. A year later, "Strong" is released from prison and set about to find the girl. The ex-convict, angered by the girl's refusal to return to him, informs the husband of her old life.

Left by her husband, with only a repetition of her past before her, she determines to revenge herself and goes forth at night to the rooms of "Strong" prepared to kill him. Her just accomplishment is made evident by tense suggestive silhouette effects, later followed by her hurried leave from the house of the dead, to find peace and unbroken rest in the dark waters of the river.

Why Are They Trying to Imitate Newman's Frames and Rails?

There's a Reason!

Because they are superior in Quality, Workmanship and Design. Because they are used in 80 per cent of the theatres. Because they are the originators for 32 years in the production of Brass Theatre Fixtures, and by their unexcelled facilities, modern methods and skilled workmen, they produce better materials at lower prices. Read what this party says:

Gentlemen:
We have had in use about four months a set of your combination Brass Easels and Poster Frames and can say that we would not be without them, as they not only improve the display of the posters but add greatly to the appearance of the lobby. Would say in conclusion that we can recommend very highly the Newman brass goods. I remain,

Very truly yours,

The perishing survivors are sighted by King Hono and his tribe of islanders. At the supplication of Kaluna, the King's daughter, the natives rescue the white people. Those rescued are Captain Bainbridge, Clifford, Paul, Rosselli and his daughter Marie and a number of sailors. The King of the island has the castaways placed in a rock-bound valley to which there is but one entrance. This entrance is guarded and although the valley is a dream of tropical splendor, the white people are held prisoners. The castaways appoint Rosselli and Bainbridge their leaders. Marie is loved by Bainbridge and this match is favored by Rosselli, the girl's father. However, the girl loves Clifford. Kaluna, the King's daughter visits the valley one day and is insulted by Bainbridge. Clifford rescues her and he and Bainbridge fight with the result that Clifford is thrown from a cliff into a stream. He follows the stream and discovers an underground river leading from the valley to the seashore. In the meantime Kaluna has carried the news of the indignity offered her to her father and he orders that Bainbridge be brought to him. Shortly after Bainbridge is made prisoner a volcano begins eruption. To appease the great fire god Bainbridge is offered up as a human sacrifice. Clifford leads the surviving castaways through the underground passage. He proved the savior of all and wins Rosselli's favor and Marie's hand by his bravery. Fortunately the castaways are picked up by a passing boat before they are overcome by volcanic fumes.

BENEATH THE MASK (Two Parts—May 18).—This picture is substituted in place of "An Old Rag Doll," a synopsis of which was published on page 1166 of the issue May 23.

Ethel is the only daughter of Mr. and Mrs. Dexter. The father is a wealthy factory owner. John Brady, foreman of the factory, takes a strong fancy to the girl and determines to win her by fair means or foul. However, his advances are more on the order of insults to Ethel. Brady, later, is discharged.

Some time later, Ethel attends a mask ball, where she dances with an unknown man—William Barnes. It is a case of love at first sight. Brady also attends this ball and secures an opportunity to make unwelcome advances to the girl. Barnes avenges this by thrashing Brady. Brady leaves, determined to get even in some way; he visits the factory, robs the safe and sets fire to the place. Barnes, in the meantime, has been trying to coax Ethel to unmask. In the friendly struggle that ensues Ethel loses her bracelet and Barnes pockets it.

Dexter, Ethel's father, learns of the fire and realizes that he is completely ruined by it. Later he dies as a result of the shock. Ethel, forced to earn her own living, secures a position in the home of Barnes' sister, unaware of their relationship. She has refused again an offer of marriage from Brady.

Barnes, continually thinking of Ethel decides to give a masked ball in his sister's home in the hope that he might again meet Ethel, whose name he has never learned. When the ball is given Ethel is in the house, but not as a guest. She notes Barnes' presence and his sad demeanor. She goes to her room and dons the dress she wore at the previous ball.

During this time detectives concerned in the fire case have been slowly fastening evidence of guilt upon Brady. Brady has learned of Barnes' mask ball, and has presented himself and secured admission, though not a guest. It is during the height of pleasure that Brady is arrested. Barnes and Ethel unmask and the light in their eyes prophesies the culmination of romance in marriage.

NESTOR

A WIFE ON A WAGER (June 10).—Wally Bristow is a wealthy young chap infatuated with a heartless society girl. He discovers that she is not true to him and leaves her. At the club he runs into an argument among the members to the effect that none of them could start out with nothing and return in a year, married and successful. Wally takes his friends up on the bet.

Wally goes West and secures employment on a ranch. He becomes the butt of the cow punchers jokes, and his employer's daughter thinks him a prig until, one day, she observes him thrash a ranch bully for ill treating a dog. Soon after she promises to be his wife. The society girl, meantime, hears of it and starts West to break up the match. Arriving in the neighborhood she sends a note to her rival saying that the man is untrue to her and to go to a certain place and she will see him with another woman. The ranch girl does this and sees her sweetheart with another woman. There is a quarrel, but the fiance, just before Wally is about to return finds her mistake. She overtakes Wally at the station—there is forgiven and the two board the train for the East. Wally wins his bet.

UNIVERSAL IKE.

UNIVERSAL IKE JR. IS KEPT FROM BEING AN ACTOR (June 9).—Another man tips his hat to Ike's sweetheart. Ike becomes jealous. Forthwith he decides that their paths must go in opposite directions. Tom, the ranch foreman invites Louise, Ike's cast-off sweetheart, to go with him to Uncle Tom's Cabin. The invitation is accepted. Ike goes to the show with the other cowboys and raises a rumpus when one of the actors looks at Louise while singing. He is ejected from the theater. An usher advises him to get a book and study how to become an actor.

Ike secures the necessary book. The cowboys are not appreciative of the histrionic talent shown by members of the Uncle Tom's Cabin company and commence shooting. The actors flee with the cowboys in pursuit. The chase ends up at the ranch where Ike has "made up" with flour and charcoal and is rehearsing. Louise hears him exclaim, "If you refuse me once more, I'll shoot," and concludes that she is to be Ike's victim. The cowboys hunt Ike. He climbs into a barrel and rolls down a hill. The barrel ends up in a pond. Ike is rescued.

AVENGED (May 24).—[This picture is substituted in place of "The Roman in Black," a synopsis of which was published on page 1014 of the issue of May 16.]

Smuggling Chinamen is a lucrative job and the old fisherman follows it successfully. One daughter, Lois, lives with him. The other, who has been deserted, struggles back to her old home, only to be met with anger by the father. Lois' sweetheart is the coastguard. He receives word that smugglers are expected to land Chinamen that night. He posts extra guards.

Lois tells her sister to hide in the cave where they used to play as children, and that she will bring her food after dark. The girl does as she is bid, unwitting of the fact that the cave is the rendezvous of the smugglers. Lois arrives just before the father comes to the place with the Chinamen. The coastguard and his men attack the party, which scatters. The old fisherman flees, but Nemesis overtakes him at the top of a cliff, when one of the Chinamen appears unexpectedly. The old man, startled, falls over the cliff to his death.

THE STONE IN THE ROAD (May 31).—[This picture is substituted in place of "The Awakening," a synopsis of which was published on page 1166 of the issue dated May 23.]

A modernized fairy tale, it tells of a rich bachelor who decides to study his relatives before making his will. A visit to them leaves him as puzzled as before. He plans a test. They are all invited to visit him on a certain day. In the middle of the road he plants a big stone. One by one the relatives pass it by until the humblest of them all decides that the stone is dangerous to traffic and moves it away. Underneath they find a note giving the finder the old man's fortune.

THE AWAKENING (June 14).—Beatrice comes to the fishing village to gather local color to be used in her painting. She falls in love with a young fisherman. Upon an invitation he consents to pose for her, and to make sure of his service until the canvas is completed, she allows him to think that possibly she might care for him. He becomes a slave to her. His own sweetheart of the fishing village is brokenhearted.

The picture is almost finished when the artist invites the fisherman to accompany her to the city that the finishing touches may be made in her studio. Once in the city the fisherman's eyes begin to open. He finds that she already has a finance, an artist like herself. In fact, he comes to know that she was merely flirting with him, leading him on that she might use him to further her art.

Did he simply resign himself to the inevitable, return to his village and marry his fisher-girl sweetheart. Yes, he did that but he did something else first. He took a knife and transformed the painting of himself into a pile of painted fragments.

natives, sees her dead horse beside her and realizes that the papers have been stolen from her, the desperation of her condition is pitiable. She crawls out of the pit only to see a pair of hungry lions in her path. To escape them she climbs up a tree and to her amazement finds a vine ladder on which she escapes into the forest.

Loubeque is anxious to secure the amulet which makes Lucille a sacred person in the eyes of the natives, and he orders his native to follow her. In their search they are seen by the lions and in fear of them Loubeque builds a fire all around him through which the lions do not date to penetrate. The smoke of this fire attracts Lucille and she steals up as near to the camping place of Loubeque as possible.

Something in the manner of the native rouses a suspicion in Loubeque's mind that the savage is not loyal, but on second thought he dismisses the doubt and goes to sleep. But his doubt of the savage is well founded, and his master is no sooner asleep than he takes the papers from his master's shirt and runs away into the forest. Lucille, however, from her vantage point has seen the pilfering of the papers and follows the man.

The lions prove the nemesis of the native and he perishe sin their clutches. In order to search the body, Lucille goes to the camp and secures a fire-brand from the fire which Loubeque, now awake and aware of his loss, has also deserted. Lucille scares off the lions and secures the precious papers from the mangled native's breech clout. She is overjoyed and makes the best time she can toward the sea-coast. Loubeque at last finds the native's body and searching it in vain, decides that the further attempt to find Lucille are in vain, as she had probably met the same fate as the thief.

Lucille in her flight to the coast sees a fluted pillar sticking out of the ground in an unusual manner, and as she is examining it, the earth about her gives way and she is precipitated into the midst of a sunken city, inhabited by a race of men similar to the monkeys but with many features which closely ally them to the human race. Possibly they are a race of missing links. At first they are afraid of Lucille as she is of them. But the encouragement of numbers in on their side and they pursue her to the rude throne of their still ruder king. His primate majesty's method of subduing his subjects is to throw necklaces of diamonds to them, and while they are occupied with collecting them he carries off the prize himself. Lucille sees that she is no safer with the king than with any of the rest of his race and in a super-human burst of strength she frees herself from him and escapes. The unwonted activity of the racing and chasing about displaces certain rocks which hold back gasses. These gasses collecting quickly explode and that side of the mountain is blown out. Once more our heroine is at liberty and she searches all along the riverbank until she comes upon a native dugout, in which she floats down the little river to the seacoast.

She finally sees a little brig standing off shore and attracts the attention of the boatswain of the ship's gig. He rescues her and takes her on board the boat. And Lucille passes one comfortable night since she does not realize that the spy, Loubeque, is on board the same boat, having been rescued the preceding day.

LUCILLE LOVE, THE GIRL OF MYSTERY (Two Parts—Series No. 6—May 19).—The sixth of the "Lucille" pictures. Hugo Loubeque, an international spy, has stolen certain valuable documents of state from General Sumpter Love—the stolen papers to be used in ruining the General. To save her father's honor from tarnish, Lucille Love, the General's daughter, undertakes to regain possession of the documents single-handed. After a series of thrilling chases over land and sea, and after she has regained the papers, Lucille is picked up from one of the South Sea islands by a sailing vessel. Little does she realize, however, that the vessel is owned by her enemy, Hugo Loubeque, and that he is aboard the same boat.

As soon as Loubeque discovers that Lucille is aboard the boat with the coveted documents, he disguises as a Chinese mandarin to further his plans in regaining the papers. Meanwhile Lucille is impressed by two members of the crew. The first is the captain, who is not long in showing her that he has evil designs upon her. The second is the first mate, a gruff old tar, with whom she makes friends. One night the captain attacks Lucille, and she is only saved from his brutality by the timely interference of Loubeque. The girl recognizes the spy despite his disguise, and puts herself on guard against him. Knowing that the papers must be valuable, the captain steals them from Lucille's cabin. Again the captain attacks her. This time the girl draws a revolver, forces the captain to the deck and shows him up to the crew as a coward. By this time there is a general feeling of unrest among the members of the crew. The time comes, however, when the sailors divide and carry on an armed mutiny. A few cast their lot wtih Lucille and the rest side with the captain. A fierce battle between contending forces is then waged upon the deck of the ship. At a critical moment when Lucille and her followers seem to be doomed, Loubeque comes unexpectedly to the girl's aid and for an instant the danger is past. But only for an instant because in the thick of the fray a battleship is sighted.

Realizing that the boat is carrying contraband arms to China and that capture will mean imprisonment, those of the crew who were Lucille's friends turn against her and join the captain. Again in command, the captain has Loubeque thrown overboard and for Lucille he has even a worse fate planned. She is placed in a row boat with a jug of water and cast adrift upon the South Seas. When she has drifted some distance from the ship, she rescues Loubeque from the water. In the small boat there is but sufficient water to last a few days. Loubeque, however, shows the greatest consideration for the helpless girl and when the chill of night comes on he covers her with his own coat.

They are alone, adrift upon the South Seas and neither has the documents, the quest of which has caused them to face so many dangers.

THE OATH OF PIERRE (Two parts—June 8).—Pierre Dorchet, a French-Canadian and professional trapper in the great woods of the North, in visiting his traps is compelled to leave his sister, Nanette, alone on the border line. His friend, Papineau, his sister's lover, acts as her guardian. Calvin Crow, civil engineer for the government, and his assistant, Kent, appear on the scene. Crow meets Nanette in his loneliness and with his compelling personality and glamor of the big city Quebec, makes love to her. Papineau tries interference, but his nature is easy going and feeling the need of a stronger hand goes to meet and warn her brother, Pierre. Pierre on his homeward trip meets his sweetheart, Julia Naughton, who lives with her mother on the border line. Papineau encounters Pierre in the woods on a familiar watercourse and hearing the news of his sister's danger, hurries forward on forced marches.

Back in the mountains, Crow has promised to marry Nanette and then heartlessly breaks camp and leaves her. Her brother and lover return and find her terribly distressed and on the verge of insanity. Overcome by sorrow she darts into her cabin and ends her troubles with a dirk. Pierre over her dead body lifts the blade at arms' length and takes his terrible oath of vengeance. In pursuance of their work, Crow and Kent plunge deeper into the wild country and encounter the Naughtons—Julia and her mother. Attracted by her pretty face, Crow at once starts a new campaign in hearts and lays siege to the affections of Julia. The mother and daughter unsophisticated and simple-hearted, are both flattered by the attentions of Crow, especially because of his connections with government work. And Crow comes dangerously near repeating the history of the unfortunate Nanette.

Pierre and Papineau in the meantime are tracking the monster toward the Naughtons. Papineau almost gives out, but is fired on by the indomitable spirit of Pierre. They arrive at the Naughton cabin at the time when Julia is forming a strong liking for Crow. The mother and daughter read the coming tragedy in the faces of the two trappers and when they produce a picture of Crow and tell the purpose of their errand, Julia steals off to warn Crow. Pierre, the brother, and Papineau, the lover, both claim the right to kill and they settle the dispute by drawing cards.

Pierre wins. Crow, warned by Julia, deserts camp and forces Julia to accompany him. Pierre comes to the camp and stands by the firelight, realizing that Crow has been warned. Crow takes advantage of Pierre's exposure by the firelight and shoots at Pierre, who apparently falls dead. Crow and Julia, Papineau and Mrs. Naughton, all hurry to the scene of the tragedy. Crow standing exultingly over his victim, is suddenly grabbed in the iron grip of Pierre and a fight of life and death ensues. Pierre and Papineau seek consolation in the solitude of the forest heretofore untrod by man, passing out of the lives of Julia and her mother.

Like many women who long for a life of ease and grandeur the Princess Ora listens to the promises of Jackson Crane and unthinkingly, on the impulse of the moment, she consents to take her little girl and leave with the ringmaster for the promise of a fine life in a different atmosphere. Leaving a farewell note to her husband, she goes with Crane.

The elopement of his wife and child with the ringmaster brings great grief to the heart of Sparrow, who is comforted by his clown friend, Pantaloon. To carry a tragedy in his soul, and comedy to the hearts of thousands, is the task Sparrow accomplishes, yet in the end his manhood dominates the great wrong done him and the hand of Providence, kind ever to the suffering, rewards the patience of Sparrow by a happy reunion.

OUR MUTUAL GIRL (No. 21—June 8).—The next person to come and volunteer his services to Mrs. Knickerbocker was "Raffles," the gentleman burglar. Always on her guard, Margaret's aunt accepted his offer, and immediately informed the police, in order that they might watch their new ally. The gangsters didn't "lay off the job," as Raffles had ordered. They had made up their mind to find the missing girl and win the fabulous sum Mrs. Knickerbocker had offered for her safe return. Moreover, they assumed that Raffles knew where she was, while he, on his side, suspected "Kid Joseph" and "Fat" Taylor of having abducted her.

The police made a systematic search of the hospitals, hotels, boarding houses and even the morgue. Plain clothes men also were stationed all over the city to watch the crowds in case Margaret might still have her liberty, though the general feeling was that she must be imprisoned and helpless somewhere, at the mercy of ruffians.

One of the gangsters trailed a blonde girl whom he saw on Fourteenth street to her apartment and kidnapped her, believing it to be Margaret. But when Ada Taylor was summoned she swore that their victim was not the niece of Mrs. Knickerbocker.

SHORTY'S TRIP TO MEXICO (Two parts—June 3).—The offer of Pedro Sanchez, the border smuggler, was seized upon by Shorty as a means of repairing a damaged heart. If he were to help Pedro smuggle arms into Mexico, he might manage to renew his affair with Anita. He had just come through a sickening experience. It was pay day and he had come up to town with the boys for a good time. The only woman in Dead Tree whom Shorty would look at, being Bessie Gordon, the dentist's wife, he had gone to the doctor's office roaring with toothache. And Gordon had insisted upon relieving him of a perfectly good molar. Afterward's the boys had treated him to the consolations of whiskey—and Pedro winning his co-operation, Shorty and the Spaniard rode off toward the border.

Meanwhile, Anita and her father had refused to hand over their stock of horses to the Mexican general, Carramba, who had trussed them up in their own hacienda, placing a guard over them, and ridden away. On a mission for Pedro, Shorty stopped off to see his sweetheart. There he discovered the plight and outwitting the guard, cut their bonds, hurried father and daughter into his automobile and drove to safety across the border.

THE LATENT SPARK (2 parts—June 4).—Everybody wondered why Tom Loomis wasn't like his father. Adam Loomis had been a member of the Cedarville Fire Department for years, but when Tom had the honor of being elected to that distinguished body, he refused to accept. It was suspected that Tom's mother hadn't exactly urged him to join. Now, Anne Hull had more spirit. At the humiliating news of her fiance's cowardice, she had thrown him over for Bud Lodge.

One dreadfully dark, windy night, the Hull's house got afire. Mrs. Hull escaped, but Anne was entrapped in her room. Before the fire department could get into their new uniforms, Tom Loomis had rushed in through the smoke and flame, and saved the girl. Everybody wondered then how Tom ever came through alive. He was frightfully burned, and the fire department went in a body to the hospital and presented him with a cup. Bud Lodge was forced to retire from Anne's favor, and fire bells were succeeded by wedding bells before the year was up.

THE EMBEZZLER (2 parts—May 29).—For twenty years Caleb Cole was the trusted accountant for the firm of Lewis & Munson. In his old age, he took the meager savings which should have gone to make his declining years comfortable, and spent the little hoard for luxuries to please his invalid grandchild, Mildred. The child was growing every day weaker, and at last the doctor told Caleb that if he expected to keep her alive a year, she must go to the country where she could have fresh air, the best of food and expert nursing.

A tremendous temptation lay at Caleb's finger tips, and he yielded. When the books were audited at the end of the month, it was revealed to Lewis & Munson that their accountant had embezzled several hundred dollars. Geoffrey Lewis was astounded. He was not a hasty nor an unjust man, and it came over him forcibly that Caleb Cole, so trustworthy all these years, must be in some unspeakable trouble. He follows Cole to the country, where he had gone to be with Mildred, and arrives at the cottage while the grandfather is absent on an errand to the village. A few moments with the child and the nurse reveal to him the situation, and quietly leaving the house he tears up the warrant for Cole's arrest and makes up the deficit to the firm out of his own pocket.

NEPTUNE'S DAUGHTER (Seven parts).—The story deals with two kings, King William of the mortal world, and King Neptune of the immortal world. The former gives to his people free fishing rights in his private waters, which are unfortunately in close proximity to Neptune's kingdom. The monarch of the sea has two daughters, Annette and Angela. While playing with other mermaids one evening, Annette is caught in a fishing net. She frees herself and hastens to Neptune's cave to apprise her father of the great danger that threatens them. Meanwhile little Angela, but five years old, tries to swim her way home alone. She too is caught in a net, but too weak to free herself, is dragged to shore by the fishermen. The little mermaid is, however, concealed by an abundance of seaweed and the fishermen, happy at the first day's catch under King William's decree, wend their way homeward rejoicing and praising their king. Little Angela, unable to extricate herself from the seaweed, dies. And so her sister, Annette, finds her. She bears the little body to Neptune and there swears an oath of vengeance against those that she feels are her sister's assassins.

The old Witch of the Sea gives her a charm in the shape of a shell, which transforms her from mermaid to mortal maiden. She is warned, however, should she lose it, never can she be immortal again. Neptune bids his daughter farewell and she comes to the land. There she meets a kindly woman, who takes her in. The old lady is the mother of the keeper of the city prison. Meanwhile King William has found that the Princess Olga, whom he loves, is unfaithful. She and the Duke Horis are plotting against his throne. Tired of intrigue and court functions the king decides to pass the day incognito and dressed as an ordinary citizen, he wanders in the forest. There he meets Annette garbed as a wood nymph. Love creeps into both of their hearts. She, of course, does not know him as a king, the man who is indirectly responsible for her little sister's death.

must sooner or later tell her who he is, sends her an invitation to the state ball. Annette now knowing from whom the invitation comes, sees in the acceptance an opportunity to assassinate the king. The hour of the ball is here, Annette is dancing before the king. He hides his face behind his hand, she draws her dagger from her hair and is about to plunge it into his breast when she is seized from behind by the drunken Duke Boris, who admiring her grace and beauty, kisses her. The king steps from the throne and orders all from the room. Then comes the recognition. She realizes that she cannot fulfil her oath and rushes away to the sea. She finds her charm and again becomes a mermaid. Time passes. The king is now the center of a conspiracy. The people have risen up against him for imaginary wrongs and he is hurled into prison. Duke Boris becomes the power and it is now that Annette feels she wishes to see the man she loves again. Back to the mortal world she comes and again is transformed and now learns of the king's imprisonment. She arranges to take the place of her friend, the city jailer. She cuts her hair short, dresses as a boy and smothers with a sack the man that stands between her and the king's liberty. She is about to unlock manacles when they are caught by Duke Boris and his followers. Quickly Annette is thrown into prison herself, and overhears a plot to assassinate the king under the guise of a fair duel. Two men are to creep up from behind and plunge their swords into the king's body as he fights with Duke Boris for the throne. Annette is now taken from prison and thrown hand and foot from a sixty-foot cliff. There, owing to her great powers of endurance in the water, she frees herself, swims ashore, only to be caught again by the man who has been hired to murder her. Now comes the fight on the top of a cliff and together into the water below they fall. Down into the depths below Annette drags the man who would kill her. Then the fight under the water, as nearby preparations are made to assassinate the king. Annette succeeds in killing her antagonist and reaches the duelling ground in time to save her lover. The king's subject learning of the injustice they have done their monarch, beg forgiveness, which is freely granted.

Olga has now sought refuge at the water edge, where she comes across the old Witch's charm which changes mortal to immortal. As she passes her hand over the odd shaped shell, she is transformed into a mermaid. Some unseen power draws her to the cave of the Sea Witch, and the latter, seeing the sacred charm broken in her hand, curses her and transforms her into a loathsome octopus, and so Olga is punished. Annette seeing that the king is not fatally wounded, rushes away to return to her father, knowing that her love is conquering her. Her shell is gone! The one link which binds her to the sea is no more. When she realizes that she can never see her father again, she falls to her knees and sobs and so the king finds her, takes her in his arms and offers to make her his queen. It is the only way. She loves and is loved, and as the story closes, we see the king and queen in all their regal glory happy, peaceful and contented.

THE GOOD-FOR-NOTHING (Essanay—Four parts.—Gilbert Sterling had never wanted for anything. He had been given plenty of money to do with as he pleased, and it was perhaps the fault of his parents that he became worthless—good-for-nothing. The firm of John Sterling & Sons had been organized by his father, and, when Gilbert was old enough, he took active part in the management. Gilbert's love for the gay life led him away from his duties, and it was nothing unusual for him to spend six nights out of the week with questionable company.

Early one morning, intoxicated, Gilbert finds his way to his home. His father reprimands him and finally puts him out of the house, telling him "never to return." Ralph, Gilbert's brother, is engaged to a society belle, by the name of Gertrude Chapin, and the end of the second reel shows the two families making arrangements for the wedding.

Years later, we see Gilbert a ragged, good-for-nothing tramp in the far West. His happy-go-lucky ways and mannerisms are appreciated by the men in the small town, who pay little attention to him, except for contributing the "makings" or an occasional twenty-five-cent piece. In the meantime, Ralph has engaged in a crooked deal. His father becomes furious and will not reconcile himself to the commercial transactions. The son leaves his office, swearing that he is through with the firm, Sterling & Son, forever. He associates himself with another company and forces his father to the wall, breaking him. The old clerk, who had befriended Gilbert many times, pleads with Ralph to help his father, but for his trouble he is requested to leave the office.

Gilbert befriends an Indian who is taken with smallpox, and as a reward, is left a deed for the Lone Star Mine. He prospers, and after months of labor, becomes very wealthy. His father and mother, in the city, now destitute, are taken to the poorhouse, Ralph having refused to help them in any way. A letter from the East informs Gilbert of his parents' whereabouts, and he hastens to them, restoring them to their old home. Ralph tries to corner the wheat market and Gilbert gets the tip and "breaks" him, and the pretty society butterfly Ralph had married deserts him, now that he is penniless. The worthless son finally saves the life of his brother, and a happy ending takes place, the family now reunited and the old firm name "Sterling & Sons" re-established.

ANNE BOLEYN (Eclipse—Three parts).—At a court gathering at Greenwich, in 1532, Sir Thomas Wyatt reads some verses to Queen Catherine, Henry VIII. hearing that the Queen has found a new lady-in-waiting, visits the assembly to inspect the new beauty. Finding that Anne is in love with Wyatt, the King asks his jester to spy upon the couple and report to him. In the gardens that night, Henry succeeds in talking for a few moments with Anne and learns definitely of her love for Wyatt. He orders her to repair to the castle at Windsor, where he organizes a hunt in her honor. Incidentally, he presents her with a beautiful pearl necklace. Wyatt, seeing the pretty bauble, reproaches her with encouraging the King. Missing Anne from the hunt, Herne, one of his henchmen, plays upon his jealousy by showing the King the two lovers seated under a tree. That same evening when Anne and Wyatt return to the castle, the King banishes Wyatt from his court and threatens Anne with the same treatment. The young lady's answer is to let her head fall upon the King's shoulder.

All the castle soon hear of the King's new favorite. Queen Catherine shows her hatred of Anne in many little ways and the King soon divorces her. Anne's hour of triumph has come, although darkened by the apparition of the demon Herne, who reveals her doom—the scaffold. Nevertheless, Anne is secretly married to Henry VIII and becomes Queen of England. Two years of bliss follow for Anne. Then to court comes Jane Seymour. The new beauty soon attracts the attention of Henry VIII and Suffolk, the King's evil genius, observing that she has fascinated his master, contrives a secret meeting between them. Anne detects the rendezvous and expresses her horror to her lord. This, however, merely serves to infuriate the fickle King and he asks Suffolk to help rid him of his Queen. This is brought about by Suffolk, who, knowing the love Wyatt had borne Anne, brings him to a room in the castle occupied by Anne. In this way Anne is arrested and taken to the tower prison.

Several days later, although protesting her innocence, Anne is tried by twenty-six peers, all instruments of the King. She is sentenced to die and on May 19, the sound of a gun notifies him that a second Queen has gone.

THE GAMBLERS Lubin.—Isabel Lamson and Catherine Spencer are old school friends, and it is the great wish of Isabel that Catherine shall marry her brother, Wilbur. James Darwin, a young attorney in the interest of business, comes into the life of the Spencer family and falls in love with Catherine. Wilbur is so immersed in business that he does not play the love game satisfactorily and Darwin wins out. Catherin tells Darwin that she does not love him really strong, but he persuades her that she will in time and they get married. Catherine tells Darwin that she really was in love with Wilbur and the husband, being of a jealous disposition, the drifting apart begins. Wilbur, in desperate effort to amass a fortune, gets his fellow directors to go into a precarious scheme to extend their banking operations and Emerson, senior, endorses them. For a time things go well until the rival bankers smell a mouse and commence an investigation which may mean state's prison for some of the party, as the Emerson chain of banks are operating illegally. The attorney-general calls on Darwin to investigate. Wilbur scours the streets for money to cover risky notes. Darwin tackles the weakest link—one of the stockholders named Cowper, and he agrees to turn state's evidence. Cowper steals the notes and substitutes forged ones. Wilbur packets the substitute notes and returns to his room, where he finds the investigators in charge. Darwin at home finds Catherine about to go to a ball given by Isabel and tells her she cannot go. After he leaves for the meeting she goes anyway. Darwin learns that he must go to Washington and returns home for his bag. Learning that Catherine had disregarded his command he goes to Emerson's for her; she refuses to leave until the husband partly explains. Cowper realizing what it means to go to jail, starts for the Darwin house with the notes and leaves them on Darwin's desk, the maid only being present. Wilbur returns home and finds detectives watching the house. His colleagues then are informed of the situation confronting them. Emerson is heartbroken, but insists on standing his share of the trouble, but Wilbur manages to take the burden on his own shoulders. He gets Cowper to make a confession and goes to secure the notes. By a clever ruse he gets into the library where the package is, but is discovered by Catherine. She secures the packet and despite his pleading refuses to part with it. Darwin returns and confronts Wilbur, who trying to explain the situation makes matters worse. Darwin cross-questions his wife and not believing the story of the papers suspects that Wilbur came simply to visit Catherine. To prove the matter he has Wilbur arrested for burglary. Catherine refuses to tell where the papers are and also to make a charge against Wilbur and declares to leave Darwin for good. She makes her threat good and leaves. Wilbur is released, as no charge can be made against him. The next morning it is agreed that Wilbur is to be sacrificed and that charges are to be preferred by the others of misuse of the notes. Catherine goes to the Emerson home and telling Isabel all, endeavors to see Wilbur. Cowper discovers that she still has the papers just as Darwin enters. Wilbur finally gets the papers from Catherine. He calls Darwin and Cowper in and surrenders the papers at the same time his written confession and offers himself to the law. Catherine declares her love for Wilbur and after getting a divorce promises to wait for him.

THE THUMB PRINT (Melies—Four parts).—The head of a gang of thieves and criminals is posing as a count and becomes engaged to the daughter of the banker, his engagement being the means whereby he can work himself into the good graces of the banker's prominent friends. It is owing to a shortness of money and the possibility of the banker discovering his identity, that he decides to murder the banker, take his keys, rob the safe and leave a finger print behind that shall throw anybody off the scent of the real murderer. Whilst the murder is taking place, the criminal accidentally scrapes a piece of glace kid off his boot. This is discovered, together with the finger print, by the detective who has been called in upon the case. The criminal is well protected, inasmuch as the secretary of the banker is one of his own paid gang, and hearing of the discovery of the detective boot, to further throw the responsibility off the count, another pair of boots is obtained and identically torn. These boots are sold to a cobbler, who exposes them out for sale, where they are recognized by one of the detective's understudies. Search is made of the count's house and his boots examined, but they do not correspond in size with those that they bought at the cobbler. Still, the detective feels that the count is in some way responsible; yet, he is unable to fasten any evidence whatever upon him.

In a spirit of challenge, the count calls upon the detective and offers to put among his collections the true copy of his own finger print. This is immediately compared with the one the detective discovered on the day of the crime. It further baffles the detective, inasmuch as there is no similarity. Nevertheless, he decides to find out all he can of the count, and sends to Italy for description and particulars of his past life. He is fortunate enough to find that the real count deserted his wife some time back, since which time he had not been heard of. Incidentally, the wife also sees the announcement of the engagement of the supposed count to the banker's daughter and decides to look up her husband before he commits bigamy. On arrival, she finds that the count is not her husband, but an imposter. Before she has time to give the identity of the man she has come to see, she is stabbed, but not killed. While sick in bed, one of the accomplices of the criminal leaves a photo of her child and suggests that if she opens her mouth against the count, the child will be killed. The detective is still balked in his endeavors to get information; so decides to raid the apartments of the count and make comparisons of his boots and sundry other things. While doing this, he is heard and discovered. In his endeavor to run away, without being recognized, he takes the wrong passage and finds himself in a trap. Fortunately, he is strong and is able to escape from the house. His suspicions now are doubled, and he decides to obtain the child himself, with the view to making the mother speak. After this, the story ends pretty quickly, and conclusive proof soon found of the entire guilt of the supposed count and his confederates, all of whom are captured in their secret rendezvous.

SPORT AND TRAVEL IN CENTRAL AFRICA (Pathe—Five parts).—Captain Machin, in charge of the Pathe expedition to the African jungle, with his staff of cameramen, guides and sharpshooters, set sail from Marseilles and arrived at Alexandria, Egypt, five days later. From there they journey by easy stages to the Nile, then met the first tribe of African natives, the Sudanese.

The first catastrophe of the trip occurred with the death of the expedition's goat, which wandered to a river and suddenly disappeared down the throat of an alligator. The disaster served to inform the explorers that there was hunting at hand, and in a very short while they had bagged a choice collection of the monster alligators. Traveling inland, the explorers passed the spot, marked by monuments, where Lord Kitchener met the Marchand expedition in 1898.

They came to a village south of Kodok, inhabited by the Shilluks, a warlike race, who live in huts of earth and straw. Here they captured a junior monkey. They christened him Coco, and he proved an amusing companion during the rest of the expedition.

Leaving the Shilluks, the explorers came to Tongo, and from there plunged into the wild jungle, which was to afford them many fine pictures, many thrills and innumerable narrow escapes from death.

Leopards, monkeys, lions and other wild creatures peculiar to the region unknowingly posed before the camera.

At Lake No, hippopotami were discovered and a hunt was immediately organized. Killing the hippos was an easy task compared to bringing home the prizes, some of which measured fourteen feet and weighed nearly four tons.

Next a vulture hunt was organized, and at a great risk a native was lowered into the nest near the top of a mountain. After an exciting battle in mid air, he gave a signal and the hunters helped him up with some fine specimens of these gluttonous creatures.

It is from a bird that dwells in the heart of the African desert that the marabou feathers, commonly used in decorating women's apparel, are obtained. The capture of the marabou is shown.

Further on a colony of alligators was discovered, and a demonstration given of the method of securing their valuable feathers for millinery purposes. Two and three-quarter pounds of the feathers secured by the expedition had a value of $1,200.

The party soon arrived on the Abyssinian frontier, and that night a loud trumpeting revealed the presence of elephants near at hand. Early the next morning a hunt was organized, and in a short time several monster elephants had fallen before the rifles of the hunters.

Having secured the jungle from end to end, the hunters faced about for home, proud of the thrilling pictures they had secured and congratulating each other on the hairbreadth escapes from charging elephants and leaping leopards which marked the trip throughout.

THE ROYAL BOX (Four parts—Solig).—The story of "The Royal Box" chiefly concerns a favorite actor of a century ago in England. James Clarence, the bon-comrade of the Prince of Wales, and one who occupied a peculiar, popular position with the play-goers of that day. The scene opens with the actors presentation at the Swedish Embassy Ball, by the Prince of Wales. There he meets Lady Felsen, the wife of Count Felsen, and she is at once charmed by his elegant manner. He apparently reciprocates her admiration and the warmth of their first meeting, inspires her noble husband to be very distant and disagreeable. The second party to the plot is Lord Basset, a petulant old roue, who urges marriage upon his beautiful ward, Celia Pryse, and singularly enough, she comes in to innocently share the big respon sibilities that make and mar the close of Clarence's career as a favorite in England. Lord Basset eventually thinks that he has made a conquest, for he is not slow in notifying the Prince of Wales and other notables of his wedding prospective. Celia temporizes with this hateful old party, but is at her wits' end to know what really to do. Finally, recalling Clarence, the actor, in a similar situation, she feels that she might do something in the dramatic section, and impulsively writes to him that she is positive she has a career ahead of her, and would like him to consult with her—almost forcing an interview upon him. However, he advises her in a letter that she should take up any other career than that of the stage. Time flies, Celia Pryse's wedding day is set and comes, but the bride has disappeared. Basset, in his rage and mortification, makes a terrible scene, and declares that his ward has been abducted by Mr. Clarence of the Drury Lane Theater.

The actor, has, in the meantime, received a pressing invitation for another reception at the Swedish Embassy, but declines. This does not cool the ardor of Lady Felsen, who, with a friend, visits him clandestinely in his dressing-room at the theater. The occasion of this appearance is simultaneous with a great benefit performance given by Clarence for an ailing comrade actor, Bob Widgets, which although in some ways, a serious matter, involves a great deal of comedy. During the course of the visit, Lady Felsen drops a fan in the actor's room. Shortly after her secret and hurried departure her husband visits the room with the Prince of Wales, and the former picks up the fan and secretes it, adding further fuel to his antagonism for the actor. The performance is gala, and the Prince of Wales has as his guests, Lord and Lady Felsen. They appear in the box, and as Clarence appears as Romeo in the balcony scene of "Romeo and Juliet," their talking is so loud, so persistently annoying, that Clarence forgets his part., comes to the footlights, and in a speech denounces them. Such reckless nerve on the part of the actor toward the heir apparent starts a terrible commotion. The audience is dismissed, and the excited actor, whose feelings are beyond his control, is hustled away to a place of safety by his friends as one out of his mind. Everybody naturally thinks that such an affront to the Prince of Wales will end his career in England, but the Prince takes the rebuke rather good-naturedly, visits Clarence in his lodgings and assures him of his unbroken friendship.

Celia Pryse, who has sought sanctuary at her aunt's, has managed to get some instruction in stage work, and keeps in communication with Clarence despite his attempts to dissuade her against the stage career. She is persecuted by her guardian, Lord Basset, and finally concludes that the only way to escape him is to emigrate to America, she, in the interim, having secured a stage position. Lord Basset more than ever believes that Clarence, the actor, is at the bottom of all his troubles, and finally secures a warrant for his arrest. This fact becomes known to Lady Felsen, who greatly fears that she may be involved in an exposure, owing to the fact that she has written Clarence a number of letters, and has sent him her portrait. He had previously informed her for her own safety that the fan she left in his dressing-room was found by her husband. Happily this incriminating bit of evidence is taken up by the Prince of Wales, who disarms the jealous count, her husband, by telling him that he himself lost it there. The upshot of all this trouble is that Clarence himself determines for the good of all concerned it would seem well for him to accept an engagement in far-off America. When the Prince of Wales and all his other friends come to see him off, he introduces Celia Pryse, who is a passenger on the same ship, as his new leading lady.

THE LILY OF THE VALLEY (Selig—Three parts).—Lily Vale's gentle ministrations to the poor folk of the mill town where her family lives ever makes her presence a benediction. She has a passionate love for flowers, particularly for wearing lilies-of-the-valley, which has won for her the appellation of "The Lily of the Valley." Her brother Philip is a lieutenant in the National Guard. When a strike breaks out in the big mills in Commercial Valley, the governor issues a call for the militia to repair to the scene of violence, and Philip's company leads the way.

Foreman Bill has felt the pinch of poverty so long he is blindly enraged against the capitalistic class. He is the leader in this strike, and what is more, he is incited by his fiery daughter, Anna, who never ceases to aid the strikers' cause and urge them on. The soldiers, after firing several volleys over the heads of the strikers, aim low with bullets and rioters fall before them maimed and wounded. The "Lily's" heart is wrung by the scenes of suffering as she goes about among the strikers in her efforts to do what she can in relieving their ills and ministering to their wounds. She does not reveal that her brother is an officer of the troops, but points to the lilies-of-the-valley that she carries and pleads with the warring men to heed such a symbol of peace and love. The rough workmen are much impressed by her message—even the strikers softens—but their wrongs are too deep and they demand absolute redress. Anna forces a paper into Lily's hands, telling her that if she will get old man Winter to sign the document, that peace will be assured, as it was his former refusal to sign the pact that caused the riot.

The fair evangel visits the hard, unyielding man in his office at the factory, presents him with a symbolic flower, and is on the point of winning him to favor the workmen and sign for peace, when a riot breaks out afresh. Stones shatter the windows of the room where they are talking; so that Winter, enraged beyond reason, throws away the document and swears to fight his employes to the bitter end. "The Lily of the Valley" turns sadly away and then visits her brother, who is in charge of the deadly machine gun. While she is arguing with him, a stray bullet enters the watch tower where they are stationed and kills the girl.

Philip, frenzied with grief over his personal loss, heedless of the consequences, without orders turns the machine gun loose and it cuts a bloody swath in the close ranks of the strikers gathered. Among the victims of this fire are the father and brother of Anna. The men are terribly incensed over this tragedy, Anna comes to the front and takes a solemn oath to find and slay the soldier who robbed her of father and brother. The men, fairly frenzied, arm themselves as they can and line up for desperate battle. In the pause in hostilities that follows, a young officer, a friend of Philip's, rushes up, tells him of the terrible thing he has done without orders. Then Philip awakens from his dreadful dream, and realizes that the consequences are something for which he is personally responsible. To avoid further bloodshed, he takes the crumpled agreement from his dead sister's hand, and rushes to Winter's office. He asks him to sign. That captain of industry refuses; thereupon Philip draws his gun and threatens him with death unless he immediately puts his name to the document. Regardless of the protests of the guards, he rushes out of the factory gate into the midst of the strikers, and shows them the peace pact with Winter's signature, just as the battle is about to begin again, so a truce ensues.

In the interim, Winter rushes to the commander to complain against the officer who forced him into signing the agreement, having no knowledge of the conditions that brought it about. Philip has been arrested and makes a clean breast in the matter, and asks both the colonel and Winter to see why he cranked the gun. Thereupon he takes them into the room, showing them the dead body of his sister, and the pair are so deeply moved they agree to jointly ask the governor to keep his name secret. Philip is released on parole to take the message to the governor, which he does, and is pardoned. With a cessation of hostilities, Philip decides to devote his life to bettering the conditions of the working people in Commercial Valley, and becomes a day laborer in the mills.

Philip secures work in a big factory. Anna, orphaned and alone, left to her own resources, secures work in the same establishment. Philip has the next lathe to Anna's sewing machine. They soon become acquainted; he is infatuated and she coyly reciprocates. He becomes interested in all her doing, and anonymously supplies her with funds to help her fellow-workers, as they club for humble charity work. Eventually, friendship ripens into love; Philip marries Anna and takes her to his palatial home. Here she sees for the first time a portrait of "The Lily of the Valley," and then it is revealed to her by Philip that this gentle girl was his sister.

One evening they are to dress for a social function when Anna discovers in the dresser Philip's old uniform, and then through a chain of singular circumstances, suspicions that he is the very man that killed her father and her brother. All at once the fire of the old vow flames within her, and she takes a revolver, intent upon shooting him. In the interim, troubles have again commenced at the factories; there is a riot in the streets similar to the one that had almost wrecked Commercial Valley years before. Anna enters the room to kill Philip, with murder in her heart and the weapon for it in her hand; but love overcomes her hatred. She casts aside the weapon and holds out her arms to again embrace him. As he turns about from the open window, a wild bullet fired from the street pierces his breast and he falls dead at her feet. Then in a "dissolve" is revealed the doubly grief-stricken woman, who has assumed the sister habiliments as the symbol of the lily-of-the-valley, and devotes the remainder of her days to helping the working people.

THE WRATH OF THE GODS; or THE DESTRUCTION OF SAKURA JIMA (Five parts).—According to an old legend, Toya San, daughter of Lord Yamaki, the last male descendant of an old Samuri family of Japan is accursed of the gods and is shunned by all. An old prophet, Takeo, makes it his business to explain to all young men that should Toya San marry, it would displease the gods to such an extent that the volcano, Sakura Jima, which has been inactive for over twenty years, would become active.

An American ship is wrecked off the coast and Tom Wilson is rescued by Yamaki, who, in order to keep Toya San away from the village people, lives alone on the beach; Wilson tells Toya San of a new God more powerful than Buddha and persuades the girl to marry him. The old prophet, when he hears that Toya San is to be married, tries to prevent it, but arrives at the American mission too late. The sky becomes overcast and Sakura Jima becomes active, throwing out lava, flames and smoke. The village and country is shaken by a tremendous earthquake. Yamaki is killed but Wilson and Toya San escape and join the American ship at anchor in the harbor.

WARNER'S FEATURES.

A MOTHER OF MEN (Three parts).—The tale starts in Dixieland and ends in a New York police court. A woman is arrested for vagrancy. When arraigned, the magistrate, a keen reader of human nature, recognizes her refinement and asks her to relate her story. The scene then shifts back a decade. You see a typical Southern plantation with its multitude of negro slaves. The woman in the police court was then a bride. Her three manly boys were the envy of the countryside. A young negro, rebelling at work, attacks Nelson, the youngest, and inflicts a deep gash on his wrist. For this, he is unmercifully horsewhipped. In revenge the negro kidnaps Nelson and his trail is lost when he swims a lake and escapes with the boy. Ten years later Civil War is declared. James, the oldest son, announces that he plans to join the Yankee troops. Heartbroken, but proud, the father dons the gray uniform of the Confederacy.

Then follow reproductions of the most thrilling battles of the war. During a terrific charge by Northern soldiers, the Confederates are finally driven to retreat. In this skirmish the father of James is unhorsed and killed. His body is recovered by James and sent back to the sorrowing wife and remaining son, Walter. Walter leaves to serve his father's cause. When he reaches headquarters he is sent on a dangerous errand into the Union lines. There he is arrested as a spy, but during the night overpowers his guard and escapes with information concerning Federal advances. He is hotly pursued by a squad under command of his own brother, James, though neither brother know that fact. Walter seeks refuge in his own home, and is there trapped. In trying to escape he leaps from a second story window. There is an exchange of shots and when the smoke clears both brothers are dead, each shot by the other. Broken in spirit, her wealth gone, the mother frees her slaves and becomes a wanderer. She sets out aimlessly to find her remaining son, Nelson, who was kidnapped many years previously. Then comes her arrest in New York for vagrancy.

Startled and bewildered by the strange tale, the magistrate rouses himself and slowly bares his wrist. There he beholds the angry red scar inflicted by the negro when a child. Suddenly he realizes that the prisoner is his own mother.

THOU SHALT NOT (Four parts).—Two miners, Jim Dawson and Jack Stone, on their way home after a lucky strike, are attacked by bandits. Their lives are saved by the timely arrival of Bob Cooper, another miner. Cooper sends a letter to Jane, his wife, by Dawson and Stone, telling of his discouragement. Arriving in the mining town, Dawson delivers the letter. Jane shows only disgust at her husband's misfortune. She is attracted by Dawson. One night at a dance two of the bandits who attacked the miners on their homeward journey, recognize Dawson and decoy him outside the dance hall. In the fight the two robbers are killed and Dawson wounded. He seeks refuge in Jane's house. Upon his recovery Dawson and Jane plan to go away. Cooper's father is suspicious and her infidelity is proved when he finds a note to Jane from Dawson. While trying to prevent the elopement the old man is shot. The couple flee. Jane is taken suddenly ill and they are forced to camp for a night. Cooper meantime reaches his home only to find his father dead with the tell-tale note in his clenched fist. Cooper starts in pursuit. Stone, fearing for Dawson's safety, gathers a posse of men and follows Cooper. Cooper overtakes the guilty couple in camp.

In a struggle between the two men, Dawson loses his footing and falls on his own knife. Cooper stays with his sick wife and keeps the fires going through the night. But in spite of his ministrations she dies, and Cooper makes a dash for freedom. At daybreak, Stone and his men come upon the scene of the ghastly tragedy. Stone steals Dawson's gold bags and writes a letter to Helen, Dawson's wife, that Cooper has killed and robbed her husband. Helen and her brother, Joe, vow vengeance on Cooper. Cooper meanwhile has made a rich strike. News of the new vein reaches Joe and he joins the first gold rush. Arriving at the diggings he becomes friendly with Cooper, who is working under an assumed name. The claim proves valuable. Joe and Cooper start for home. The two men stop at a mining town where Joe becomes infatuated with a dance hall singer. Cooper, who tries to break Joe's attachment to the dancer, is recognized by Stone, now the owner of the dance hall. Stone threatens to arrest him. Cooper escapes, but in the general fight Stone is wounded. He tells Joe that Cooper killed Dawson. Joe pursues Cooper, overtakes him and in the struggle that follows, Cooper is injured and Joe is kicked by his horse into a ravine. Cooper manages to reach a house which is Dawson's home. Helen nurses him back to health. Her interest in him ripens into love, when she receives a letter from Joe, revealing Cooper's identity. Conquering her love Helen sends a note to the mounted police disclosing Cooper's whereabouts. Cooper fully returns Helen's love and tells her of his past. Helen is overwhelmed by his confession, her husband's perfidy and the injustice she has done Cooper, who shows her the note wrenched from his father's dead hand. Thinking, now, only of Cooper's safety she helps him to escape, and when the police gallop up to the cabin she sends the men in the wrong direction, and rides after him, leaving a note for her brother explaining all. Helen finds Cooper exhausted under a tree, where he has fallen from his horse. She revives him—they pledge their mutual love and we see them riding away together toward the far horizon in the rays of the setting sun.

THE HUMAN WOLVES (Five parts).—Elsa Delgarth, a retired actress married to a rich politician, returns to the stage to act in a series of charity shows. The glamour of the footlights causes her to become tired of domestic life and she leaves her husband and child to return to the stage.

Paul Greville, an actor, with whom Elsa runs away, loses his memory while appearing in a production, and as a result the couple find themselves face to face with ruin. Unable to obtain engagements, Greville sinks lower and lower in the social scale until meeting a criminal named Gaston St. Croix, he agrees to join the latter's gang. The commissioner of police is informed of a number of mysterious thefts, and immediately stations his squad of officers on the river bank to track the mysterious gang. That night the crooks are tracked, and a battle on the water ensues, but they make their escape.

Elsa is unaware of the double life Greville is leading and for some months the man takes part in the crimes of the riverside gang. Meanwhile Delgarth has received an important government appointment and the St. Croix gang plot to gain possession of valuable documents he holds. Greville and an accomplice break into Delgarth's home, but are disturbed before they can accomplish their purpose. THE BATTLE OF VERA CRUZ

A World Scoop!

THESE epoch-making pictures—2,000 feet—were taken by Edwin F. Weigle staff photographer, for the Chicago Tribune.

They are the ONLY motion pictures ever made of an actual battle in which Uncle Sam's fighters took part and are ABSOLUTELY THE ONLY motion pictures taken of The Battle of Vera Cruz.

A big and legitimate box office attraction—held over second week at Jones, Linick & Schaefer's La Salle Theatre, Chicago.

DAILY TRIBUNE: MONDA

WAR MOVIE ON SCREEN TODAY

Vera Cruz Pictures at La Salle and Colonial.

YANKEE SAILORS LAUGH.

Weigle's Film Only Actual One of City's Occupation.

"The Battle of Vera Cruz," the title of the only moving pictures taken of the occupation of the Mexican seaport, will be shown today at the Colonial and La Salle theaters. They were taken by Edwin F. Weigle, staff photographer of THE TRIBUNE. Mr. Weigle will lecture on the pictures today at the Orpheum theater in Milwaukee, and will repeat the lecture this week before the Chicago Advertising association.

Mr. Weigle has received offers from booking agencies in London, the Philippine Islands, Japan, and China, and it is probable the pictures will be exhibited in the foreign lands. A special invitation will be sent to President Woodrow Wilson to view the film in Washington.

Show History in the Making.

The pictures show three days of real red, white, and blue American history in the making. They begin with the flight of Americans and other refugees from Mexico, showing the landing of marines and bluejackets in Vera Cruz, exhibit the accuracy of the marksmanship of American fighters, and the capture of "snipers" and wind up with the final occupation of the city with the sailors patrolling the streets on police duty.

The pictures show how the Americans go through the fighting with business like precision. There are no heroes rushing to the breastworks with American flags as are shown in most of the "fake" reels of the war now being exhibited. There are no weeping girls left behind as the soldiers march away.

HEPWORTH AMERICAN.

THE MISTRESS OF THE AIR (Three parts).—Florence, a wealthy hydroaeroplane flyer, meets Tom, a fortune hunter and owner of a dirigible airship, who presses his attentions without success. One afternoon at a reception at Florence's residence she is introduced to Dick Sterling, with whom she falls in love. Tom, noticing Florence's attentions to Dick, becomes very jealous and censures her about it, and then takes her in his arms and tries to kiss her. Florence objects and screams. Dick rushes in and interferes. Tom resents Dick's intrusion and leaves the scene. Later he sends a note asking forgiveness and invites Florence and her friends to the christening of his airship and to take the first ride in the clouds.

Florence accepts and tells her friends to meet at her house the next day. Dick is first to arrive and is making desperate love to Florence under the shade of a rose bush when Tom, unnoticed, arrives and realizes Florence's love for Dick. Tom makes his presence known, after which the entire party leaves by automobile for the aviation field. The christening over, Tom and Dick make a trial flight out over the ocean. Florence through her field glasses sees a struggle between the two men, Dick being thrown from the airship into the ocean. She jumps into Dick's auto, rushes to the hangar, takes out her hydroaeroplane and starts out to rescue Dick, who is swimming in the ocean. Tom returns and reports Dick having accidentally fallen overboard and then presses his suit again on Florence, but she, knowing the true status of affairs, repulses him.

A few weeks later Florence enters her hydroaeroplane in a race against a motorboat. Tom has bet heavily upon the motorboat. He borrows a pair of pliers and enters the hangar of Florence's hydroaeroplane and cripples it. The following day Florence wins the first two heats of the race, but while flying about 200 feet in the air returning her machine is seen to collapse and fall into the ocean. Motorboats rush to her rescue. Dick, surmising that some villainous work has been done, puts detectives on the case and Tom's pliers are found near the hangar. Tom is found at Florence's home, again pressing his suit upon her. He is arrested and while being taken to jail breaks away from the detective and attempts to escape by crossing a stream upon a small hand ferry. He is told to halt and not heeding, is shot by the detective and falls into the stream and disappears. A month later Florence and Dick are married at an "aerial wedding," which takes place in her hydroaeroplane and they fly away upon their honeymoon, disappearing in the clouds.

THE HAND OF DESTINY (Four Parts)—Robert Rogers is heavily in debt as a result of gambling. He gets word from one of his cronies that there is a way out if he would consult Phony Bill. He does so and gives Phony Bill a note for a sum of money if he will supply him with a sum of counterfeit money. The arrangement is made and carried out but Phony Bill refuses to give up the note. Rogers takes from the vault of the bank in which he is employed some good money substituting the bad. The cashier is accused of the theft and sent to prison for a long term of years, leaving to the mercies of the world a wife and infant daughter. Some twenty years later, Stephen Rogers, son of the original crook, whom his father has left wealthy, employs as a stenographer, Ethel Hartley, the cashier's daughter. Not suspecting who she is, he takes her to his country home to do some special work for him. While she is there he makes advances to her but is repulsed. He finds some of her correspondence and learns for the first time who she really is. She runs away and finds a home with one of Rogers' tenants, but Rogers drives her away from there. Driven to desperation she tries to commit suicide, but is rescued by Chester Thorne, who, on learning part of her story, places her in the care of his mother. While she is there he falls desperately in love with her. Rogers happens to be passing one day and sees the couple. He goes home and decides to tell her lover her history. One day an old tramp is passing and Ethel brings him in and feeds him. On her recommendation Chester gives him a job on the place. When Rogers calls to make his exposur, the tramp, who is the long-forgotten Phony Bill, produces the note and proves that Ethel's father was innocent and that in reality Rogers' father was the guilty one.

Mr. Harry Hirshfield,
Phila. Moving Picture Supply Co.,
1233 Vine St., Phila., Pa.

Dear Sir: I wish to thank you for your courtesy and promptness in reinstalling my two Mirroroide Screens in the 59th St. Airdome and in the Ridge Ave. Airdome. They are both tight as a drum, as you promised they would be.

I wish to add that these Screens are showing as clear and bright a picture as when they were new although they have been used outdoors for three summers, and have endured all sorts of weather, rain and shine — and have been rolled up and stored in an attic each winter. I do not know of any Theatre either outdoors or enclosed that can beat my pictures. One of my Airdomes has a throw of 125 feet.

One of the principal advantages of the Mirroroide Screen is the fact that it enables me to open the show while it is still nearly daylight.

Yours very truly,
CHARLES H. GOODWIN.

COOLING VENTILATION HEATING

"TYPHOON BLOW-IN SYSTEM" has revolutionized the ventilating problem. You get in front of a desk fan to keep cool, not in back. Apply this common sense and blow the air in.

Don't waste money experimenting with exhaust fans.

The TYPHOON MULTIBLADE BLOWER will force air right through ordinary exhaust fans. Reversed, the air can be exhausted as well.

Our Catalogue W tells how to keep cool in summer and warm in winter.

New York, April 20th,1914.

Messrs. Chas.L.Kiewert Co.,
165 Greenwich Street - City.

Gentlemen:

It may please you to know that I have adopted the BIO CARBON for use in this theatre. I chose it because after experimenting with all other makes, it gave me the best results, and I am able to procure a perfect light, which is after all the most essential thing in projecting a picture.

Our throw is 170 feet and experts have told us that we have the most perfect picture in New York City.

If this letter may be of any assistance to you, you may publish it in any form you choose.

Very truly yours,

THE PHANTOSCOPE

Have you noticed that our advertisement appears here week after week?

Do you think we are doing it because we have more money than brains?

Isn't it a more logical conclusion to suppose that we are selling Phantoscopes and that each sale makes a friend?

This friend boasts of the satisfaction he gets out of the machine, and this sells others.

In this way the Phantoscope has made its splendid reputation, and is adding to its friends weekly.

Will you be one this week? Sure it is, you will not be disappointed, for the Phantoscope is a motion picture projecting machine which accepts conditions just as they are in your office or your home, and projects a brilliant picture for your own and your friends' entertainment or instruction. It is remarkable for its lightness, low cost, and safety.

IMPORTANT

¶ Attention is directed to the fact that the Goodwin Film & Camera Company have granted us the right and license to import, use and sell to others to be sold or used during the life of the United States Letters Patent No. 610861 (the so-called Goodwin Patent) both AGFA and GEVAERT cinematograph or motion picture film.

This action on our part has been prompted mainly by our desire to relieve our customers of any concern that may have been caused by any claims made in the past or that may be made in the future, to the effect that film purchased from us infringed upon such patent.

We shall continue as heretofore to market AGFA and GEVAERT negative and positive motion picture films, which have become famous throughout the world for their superior photographic qualities.

announces the following

Film Stars appearing exclusively in Majestic Releases and "Griffith" special features

BLANCHE SWEET	DOROTHY GISH	HENRY WALTHALL
LILLIAN GISH	MAE MARSH	ROBERT HARRON

MAE MARSH

ROBERT HARRON

An important point regarding Majestic pictures concerning which we feel justified in being somewhat proud is Photographic Quality.

Pursuing our recently announced policy of informing exhibitors and the public of our candid opinions about our own releases, and trusting that these estimates of the picture quality of Majestic films may come to be accepted as reasonably reliable and therefore of value, we append the second installment of

The Majestic Guide for Exhibitors

THE SOUL OF HONOR, two reels, for release Sunday, May 31. An especially strong and gripping drama featuring Blanche Sweet and Henry Walthall.

THE NEWER WOMAN, one reel, for release Tuesday, June 2. A delightful comedy drama, presenting Dorothy Gish and Robert Harron.

THE INTRUDER, two reels, for release Sunday, June 7. A fairly good and rather unusual offering, being a free adaptation from a copyrighted story in "Smart Set."

HER BIRTHDAY PRESENT, one reel for release Tuesday, June 9. Acceptable but not exceptional, introducing, however, Mae Marsh and Robert Harron.

Selig

"JUDGE DUNN'S DECISION"

"JUDGE DUNN'S DECISION"

The Judge, a very busy man, has little time to look after his family; so that they drift into extravagant ways. Reform becomes a necessity. He steels his heart, and disciplines his own for injustice. A strong story of up-to-date fashionable life.

IN TWO REELS. RELEASED JUNE 8th.

June 9th—"Eugenics At Bar 'U' Ranch"

An enterprising old maid, who has studied Eugenics, goes out to a ranch to find a perfect type of man for a husband. She raises a great hubbub and drives the cowboys back to the tall timber.

June 10th—"The Doctor's Mistake"

A young doctor returns from a banquet befuddled, and when he receives a call from his sweetheart late at night for wafers to relieve neuralgia, believes he has sent mercury tablets instead. He becomes the abject slave of fear. A very dramatic story.

June 12th—"Bombarded"

An inventor of high explosives is hoaxed by his would-be son-in-law, who thus wins his daughter. A cracking good comedy.

On the same reel with

"Doc Yak's Zoo"

June 13th—"When The Night Call Came"

How a daughter of the submerged is raised to high ideals and a good life through the power of love, is the crux of an interesting pictorial narrative.

"YOUNG MAN GO WEST"

THIS remark by the famous Horace Greeley gave impetus to the exploitation of the great Western section of North America.

In accord with the spirit of progress, the Panama Canal will open shortly and large areas of Western territory, as yet untouched, will become productive.

The "Go Forward" slogan has been adopted by the people of this wonderful country, and their efforts along these lines command the admiration of the world.

Great strides have been made in the amusement field both in the West and Northwest, and motion picture theatres are numerous and extremely popular.

There are thirty-five of these in Vancouver, B. C., thirty-three in Tacoma, Wash., and out of this total of sixty-eight theatres, sixty-four are using motion picture projecting apparatus of Power's manufacture.

SIX WONDERFUL REELS WITH 600 LAUGHS
Picturized by WALTER HALE

Endorsed by Press, Public and Filmdom's severest critics as a Smashing Hit, at its premier presentation at the Comedy Theatre, New York.

THE FIRST BIG FEATURE TO CARRY A LAUGH THROUGH SIX REELS

Morning Telegraph:
Seldom, if ever, has a play been more artistically shown or more thoroughly appreciated. The scenes aroused the audience to "Ohs!" and "Ahs!" The acting was of the highest order. The theatre was packed and it looked more like the presentation of an important opera than the opening of a feature film.

Moving Picture World:
There are many charming bits of scenery in this film, and the list of the performers is a formidable one. * * * It has many really comic situations.

Motion Picture News:
A very marked success, and movie maniacs are still raving over its many novelties. It is far in advance of anything heretofore shown in this field.

A SCIENTIFICALLY CONSTRUCTED CONDENSING LENS!!

The advent of the Kleine White Label Condenser has caused a sensation.

No longer need you fuss with condensers moulded from ordinary glass.

Kleine White Label Condensers are ground from the highest grade optical glass — they are guaranteed not to discolor — no light is lost!

Cheap condensers turn all colors of the rainbow and absorb an unnecessary quantity of the good light you pay for. Why run up "Juice" bills—accuse high salaried operators of incompetency—fuss with lenses—and then throw an indifferently good or a genuinely poor picture, all because a condenser isn't doing its duty!

Use the Kleine White Label Condenser—the condenser that never turns color — and you will obtain a clearly defined spot with a brilliant white light.

Facts and Comments

THE MOVING PICTURE WORLD extends its sincere greeting to all the exhibitors and friends of the motion picture who have come to New York to attend the Exposition of the Motion Picture Arts and the Convention of the International Motion Picture Association at the Grand Central Palace. We congratulate the men who have arranged the Exposition and Convention. They have labored hard and conscientiously, and the results are gratifying. There are great possibilities for the achievement of some valuable constructive work in this convention. It is pleasing to learn that the proceedings of the convention will be open and that the press will be admitted to all the discussions on the great vital topics of the industry. It is planned to make an appeal for a broader scope of organization and to unite all the various sections and interests in the industry in one co-operative union, after the pattern of France and England. We cannot help looking with favor upon all efforts tending in that direction. In a true and representative film parliament all the factors in the industry ought to have their proper share of representation. A community of interest would bind together all the great branches of the industry, and there ought to be an especially strong and sympathetic bond between the producers, the distributors and the exhibitors. An enlightened self-interest ought to make these representatives of the industry work together and help each other. Organization on such a basis would be a boon to the entire industry.

A CLERGYMAN in New Zealand objects to the great religious film known as "From the Manger to the Cross." He said it could not be denied "that portions of the film were beautiful and reverent, notably those dealing with the birth and childhood of Christ, but the scene before Pilate was coarse." If our friend will turn to the description of the scene in the various gospels he will encounter the same objection. A fanatical Eastern mob wrought to a frenzy passion is necessarily repugnant and coarse. Does our friend maintain that the scene is not essential to the truthful representation of a life of Christ? Is it well from our friend's point of view to make the story of Christ known to all nations? How can this be done better than in moving pictures. The presentation in dramatic form of the events recorded in the New Testament has been hallowed by generations of Christians probably as devout and as pious as this New Zealand preacher. The presentation in films made in the very land which has so aptly been called the fifth gospel, has a distinct religious value as an eloquent witness to the authenticity of the gospels.

A SCHOOL-TEACHER in Cleveland writes to THE MOVING PICTURE WORLD that she has studied the influence of picture plays on her pupils in school. "It has been my custom," she writes, "to devote one language period per week to oral expression and story-telling. Of their own accord the pupils began to tell me of the stories seen at photoplay theaters during that week, and as nothing I had as yet tried brought such enthusiastic response and unflagging interest, I have kept this hour ever since for oral and written reproduction of stories presented at the picture-play theaters during that week." Here is a bit of constructive work, and the originator of it is entitled to commendation. The development of the power of expression through the motion picture will in due course of time be appreciated by all teachers and will be generally utilized.

AN EXHIBITOR in Somerset, Pennsylvania, is moved to write to us of his experience, declaring that he "can go the New England exhibitor one better." He refers to the exhibitor whose example in appearing before the Ladies' Civic League was favorably commented upon in these columns. He was called upon by the best elements in the community, including principals of high schools, the Parent Teachers' Association and the Ladies' Civic League, to speak on behalf of the motion picture. Happily he was able to do so with good effect, because he practised what he preached, running a special educational program every Friday night. It has been the regretful experience of our exhibitor that the response to his educational afternoons has not always been of an enthusiastic character. It does happen too often that the very people who are most insistent upon educational programs are quite indifferent about patronizing them. We glean, however, from the general tone of our correspondent's letter that he is by no means discouraged and that the best people in the city are his regular patrons.

Pictura, A Social Agent

By Louis Reeves Harrison

"DRAMA" means a story told by words and action on the stage, and includes composition, the representation itself, together with its adjuncts and the action that leads up to a crowning issue. We have no word of such inclusive significance for the conception, production and exposition of moving pictures. I have taken the liberty of using the Latin term, "Pictura," meaning pictures, for that purpose, covering the representation of ideas directly, and not through the medium of spoken language. Drama, "Pictura," literature, are three vigorous civilizing factors of some relationship, yet of distinct individuality.

I have chosen to give the drama a higher significance than it used to possess because it is becoming more closely allied to literature in its development having a kindred purpose, and both are rising for a reason that might lose value if explained in a few words. It was formerly supposed that the great dramatist, like the great novelist, sat at a desk and wrote with a Bryan-like smile of complacent self-satisfaction on his face, while in a glow of inspiration. He may have done so at times, but nobody ever saw him do it. "Inspiration," an awakening of thought by some external influence, a sort of intellectual exaltation, has always been popularly associated with the work of creative genius. Even the word "creative" has been exalted in its use, but the plain truth is that all normal minds are creative. The mind of genius is more than that.

We have to go clear back to physical conditions, tremendous brain capacity and large vital energy, matters of heredity, for a starting point, for genius depends very largely upon natural ability to stand the strain of intense mental effort during long periods of time. On that account, genius is often defined as ability to do hard work, but hard work may be poorly aimed and only so much energy expended to no purpose on that account. That energy must be directed by a selective taste in one of a dozen directions, eleven of which are wrong. The one whose critical knowledge enables him to choose the right line of development at every one of a hundred stages in its development is the only one capable of producing a work of genius.

The moment accurate critical knowledge is coupled with creative mental energy of unusual power, results of value may be expected, and the illusion of inspiration vanishes in thin air. Where that critical ability is lacking, there may be attractive ideas offered for consideration, and they may pass for the gold of truth among credulous people, may even cause some people to abrogate their reasoning powers and accept a creed, but they are false conceits and do more harm than good. Sound critical judgment, then, is the distinguishing characteristic of genius—ability to pan out pure gold from a lot of dross and reject the erroneous.

Now drama has risen with literature above meaningless creative effort into a higher realm, that of supplying what does not hold out false hopes, that of representing ideas of life with enough naturalness of detail to make them plausible, but with an unerring critical knowledge when a truth is to be enforced. In drama, pictura or literature, accuracy of treatment is of secondary value, only a means to an end, and that end is bringing to light, through a criticism of life, some truth that has a bearing on the time in which it is promulgated. Drama, pictura, literature—each in its way—might be said to reach supreme development as a criticism of life, especially of contemporary life.

That is what I mean when I say the drama and literature have a higher significance to-day than they used to possess, because they offer a critical presentation of conditions needing improvement or replacement. I have therefore urged for many years that Pictura, mute child of Drama and Literature, resembling one in method and the other in structure, should be freed of old errors and drive straight along the finest and most modern of parental lines, be a direct and wordless medium of presenting interesting criticisms of life as we know it.

It may justly deal with crime and its punishments, its amelioration, its elimination by humane methods. Among our strong instinctive desires may well be included that of preserving and improving race quality. Next to reproductive and self-preservative instincts, this is probably the strongest in human-kind. We are bound together in a complicated social existence that could not exist except by the intelligent control and self-denial we exert. Those weaklings who are only impelled by instincts of reproduction and self-preservation, who think they can do as they please regardless of the rights of others, do not realize that their own lives depend upon communal protection and on that account cause festering sores of decadence, degeneracy and crime.

We deal with crime for its cure, not for the glorification of what is opposed to the safety and happiness of the family. The family is the foundation on which our nation, even our civilization, may be said to rest. By upholding it we strengthen bonds whose disintegration means debasement of all we now hold dear. No sane man attempts the destruction of family any more than he does that of society, but this does not exempt social laws and customs from criticism. The needs of our social state are constantly outgrowing its forms; we are emotional, largely guided by sentiment—we have sacrificed thousands of millions of money and hundreds of thousands of men for a principle—so there is an eradicable idealism in our hearts to which drama, literature and pictura are bound to appeal, and they can best be used as a criticism of life.

It is as a criticism of life that the production of moving pictures may rise to a very high plane in the hearts of intelligent people. An overwhelming number of us were normal at birth—nature makes for health—and most of us would, if given suitable opportunity, live normal lives. We can therefore apply criticism in storied form to unwholesome congestion, to low nutritive standards, to the semi-slavery of overwork, to conditions that crush instead of encourage human achievement. The inequity of laws and their farcical enforcement abound in dramatic material. But I do not mean that criticism of disadvantageous social conditions should be like some of it applied to the photodrama, incompetence judging inanities.

I do not mean that we are to preach sermons, or thrust reform down unwilling throats—that may be left to the militants—but I mean that this new art should catch the spirit of the times. In the words of Sculptor Borglum—"The spirit of the hour is world-building. The young hemisphere is just reaching its emotional consciousness. It is on the brink of new achievement—that of attaining soul freedom. We have not begun as a people to realize the things we honestly desire, things to be proud of; things to sing about; to talk about; to write about; to portray; that they are ours and that they belong to no one else; the things that make us immortal, that make us the envy of the world. Those great principles which make us a people should themselves conceive and shape and bring forth our institutions, and they should suggest and re-suggest the great life we have begun and are living."

Belasco on Motion Pictures

In an Exclusive Interview with the Moving Picture World the Great Master of Visualization Tells of his Impressions and Expectations—"You Are at the Dawn Not at the Zenith"—He Will Help in the Work of Filming—Why He Chose Lasky as His Film Interpreter.

By W. Stephen Bush.

IF YOU, good reader, are still in doubt as to the world-conquering powers of the motion picture and if in defiant unbelief you ask for a "sign" it shall be given to you and here is the "sign": Belasco is willing to intrust his plays to the screen.

Now this does not mean to imply that his plays are greater than all others; in these days the creations of the most gifted minds are absorbed and often made more glorious by the camera. Nor does the fact that Belasco loved the various embodiments of his art as much as a father loves his children in the flesh constitute anything like a revelation. The "sign" lies in this circumstance: Belasco has devoted all his life to the worship of art. The atmosphere of art is to him the breath of life. Had he not recognized the quality and power of art in the motion picture the great Belasco plays would have remained lost to the film for probably another generation.

Meaning of Belasco's Entry.

To appraise the significance of Belasco's entry into the realm of the filmed drama it is well to emphasize the fact that Belasco's art has always been eminently sane. His art is Shakespearian in its sanity. He sees life as it is and as most of us see it. He strives to portray it as it is: new at every turn, forever fascinating and forever mysterious. One test and one definition may be applied to all he ever did: He kept away from the impossible ideals of conventionalism and from all that bore even the trace of artificiality. Stereotyped molds were to him an abomination. With the unerring instinct of the true artist he eschewed the refined mediocrity of the Sardous and of the whole Victorian school. Nor did the other extreme ever lead him astray. He never conceived that the drama was the best medium for exploiting the secrets of the operating room or the mysteries of the higher pathology. He could discover no relationship between the higher surgery and dramatic art. In his judgment art can never have any pretext for exploring the sewers.

Jesse Lasky and David Belasco.

Between Zola and Sardou he found a middle course which, as I said before, was guided by the compass of sanity. Hence the enduring popularity of his works; hence the esteem in which the fairest critics in all the world, the American public, hold the name of Belasco.

In the theater bearing his name not far from New York's "central roar" David Belasco, the greatest of American dramatic producers, is wearing a sweet crown of contentment, the reward of a life-long fidelity to high ideals. The offices in which the famous master of visualization spends his working hours, long hours and fertile ones, suggest anything but the average theatrical offices which take such vulgar pride in just being "busy." The place breathes dignity and there is a marked absence of haste. Were it not for the undercurrent of activity which is all-pervading one might fancy one's self in a quiet cloister, for the footfalls are easy, conversations are carried on in whispers, the lights are subdued and there is a harmony of colors. That the place is the loved abode of a lover of art is evidenced by the pictures found on every wall and partition. They and other works of art could have been selected by none but an artist with a strong dramatic instinct and an eye for pictorial effect.

Every Inch an Artist.

The master of this home of inspiration looked eminently fitted for the throne. In the very prime of his usefulness, with his capacity for the enjoyment of his work undiminished, time passes most happily for Belasco. Modestly and without a trace of condescension he submits himself to the interviewer. A deep spiritual nature expresses itself in every look and every gesture of the man. Who said that the "assiduous study of art emasculates the intellect." Belasco's features are strikingly intellectual. That much of his personality would reveal itself to a crowd of 'longshoremen and perhaps even to members of the junior vaudeville. The lips are mobile, perhaps a trifle ascetic, the nose betrays daring capacity and enterprise, the forehead is lofty. The hair white with tinges of gray is as thick as that of a football hero. Belasco's personality no less than his plays reveals the character of the man. His voice is pitched in a soft but lively key; the cadence is pleasing, the utterance almost elocutionary in its distinctness.

"I shall never engage in the production of motion pictures on my own account," he said, after brief introductions. "My other interests are too large, they take all my time, and I feel that I am dedicated to this work in the theater. I am a slave to this work, but my heart's ease comes of a knowledge that I am doing this work to the best of my ability and in obedience to the highest inspirations. A few years ago I never thought that I would ever be associated directly or indirectly with any enterprise in motion pictures. I had a poor opinion of the motion picture then."

"What was your opinion?" I asked.

His First Glimpse of the Pictures

"I thought," said Mr. Belasco, with still a faint tinge of protest in his voice, "that there was no useful appeal of any kind in the pictures. I thought their effect was bad. The spreading out of details of crime, the elaboration of highway robberies and hold-ups, the obscene portrayals, the exhibitions of slum-life, the cheap cowboy films were bound, I thought, to have a bad influence on our young men and women. I had offers from all sorts of men to let them film my plays. Some of these offers were generous to the point of extravagance. I declined them all because it seemed to me that under the methods of production as I had seen them my plays might have suffered the fate of travesty. One of your best known directors had been after me for a long time. I guess he had been trying for a year to get me to look at one of his pictures to convince me that there were possibilities which the cheap film could never reveal. Well, I resisted him as long as I could, and then I did look at one of his pictures and I must say that I saw things in a different light from that day forth. Perhaps I might say that this was the turning point in my attitude toward motion pictures. Well, this happened about two years ago, but on the whole I still continued indifferent. When I was abroad more recently the film plays that I saw in Italy increased my respect for the motion picture. When I saw 'Quo Vadis' I felt that the motion picture had put on seven league boots. In the meantime offers for the filming rights of my plays kept coming and I began to consider the possibility of accepting one of the offers. I was very slow and deliberated for months before making a decision and when I made it I was guided by just one consideration: The likelihood of the most artistic and conscientious and liberal portrayal. I saw three or four of the Jesse L. Lasky productions besides many others, and I felt I should hesitate no longer. I gave the rights to Mr. Lasky and his company purely on the merits. They were indeed generous in the financial inducements offered but I am free to say that if the mere gain of money had been my object I might have made other arrangements. I feel that these men, young, ambitious and not afraid of new departures or of a generous outlay of money will do justice to my productions."

Will Aid in Work of Filming.

"Do not expect to take an active part in the filming work, Mr. Belasco?"

"Well, I will be glad to render any help that it may be thought I am capable of rendering. I will expect to be present at rehearsals whenever possible, and look over scenarios. I think that will about sum up my connection, if I were to attempt more it might have to be at the expense of my work in the theater. I could not divide my time. To me nothing can ever take the place of the speaking stage, nothing to me can supplant the charm and the dramatic efficacy of sound. Let me say here that I think this attempt to accompany pictures with imitations of sounds or of human voices is inartistic, unconvincing and unreal. The future of your art surely does not point in that direction.

What Belasco Thinks of the Talking Pictures.

Adding an echo to a shadow makes the entertainment artificial and mechanical. The pictures must speak for themselves, yes, that is just what they must do. The effort to make pictures talk or sing is merely a bid for cheap novelty. Let them be honest and show the pictures as pictures; the other way is incorrect and foolish. When I flash a tableau on the stage I do not have a mob shouting out what the tableau is supposed to mean. Words at such moments are both superfluous and ridiculous."

The Dawn Not the Zenith.

"My friend," continued Belasco, with an evident sense of relief at having spoken his mind and having gratified his sense of the truly artistic "your art is at its dawn, not at the zenith. I verily believe that in the near future we will witness marvels of pictures such as no one is dreaming of now. There will be an unequalled perfection of detail and the educational incident will be more of a factor than ever. What revelations what sources of pleasure were such places as The Tower and Westminster Abbey to me. Association brings the past to life but nothing can give us such realism in association as the motion picture. On the stage we must give you a bit of painted canvas for Niagara Falls or the Nile, you show us the real thing. The world is your stage. These considerations and my abiding faith in the Lasky people have induced me to give my plays to the screen and to help when necessary is doing them justice on the films.

Belasco's Expectations.

"Let me say through you that the main feature of my agreement with Mr. Lasky and his company is their promise to put my plays on the film in a manner benefiting their success and reputation. Nothing can be done without a free expenditure of money. In my own experience as a producer I have discovered this one fact: The public is quick to respond to liberality. When the public learn that you think the best is just good enough for them they will pass their money in through the little opening in the ticket office and pay a generous interest on your investment. This thing of trying to get something for five dollars that cannot be got properly for less than ten is foolish. The cheap, little pictures of the Dick Turpin variety, the crude and tawdry attempts at portraying life, the painful efforts at comedy, the sickening unreality of life are or have been poisoning the soil and robbing it of its flowers, they have destroyed poetry and the sense of art, the soul and imagination of the young and have handicapped them in their mental and moral growth. Every superior work means time and lots of money. There must never be any hesitation in employing the best talent, wherever it can be gotten and whatever it may cost. I know the resources and I know the ambition of Mr. Lasky and the other young men with him. They have told me that I am privileged to cancel all arrangements if upon their filming of my first production I find that they have stinted. I may annul everything if they do not come up to my expectations. I have no doubt, however, on that score. They do know what I expect, they know that I will be critical. They have promised to stage "The Darling of the Gods" in Japan and to embalm in enduring films the missions and the mission life of California now passing rapidly into history. My plays will give them their opportunities. I am, I assure you, very earnest and very anxious about this and I want to see them at the top of the ladder."

The spell of the motion picture is working on Belasco. It is a subtle spell as we all know and in the end it always proves irresistible. I think, after he has seen his first play upon the screen, the greatest living visualizer, the adept in the art to make others see what he sees and as he sees it, will be heard from in a second eulogy of motion pictures and there will be no more hesitation nor qualification.

NEW YORK'S OFFICIAL BADGE OF SUPERIORITY.

Foremost among the cities of North America because of its industrial and commercial activities, New York is to win even greater prestige than it now enjoys through systematic advertising of its enviable position.

At a dinner given by the Members Council of the Merchants' Association of New York Tuesday evening, May 26, the adoption of an official emblem or insignia was announced. It is the intention of the association that merchants and manufacturers who ship goods from New York to all parts of the country shall attach to each package shipped a reproduction of the official emblem in the form of a paster, stencil, or tag in order that the immense volume of merchandise which goes out annually from the city may advertise New York's supremacy as a commercial center all over the world.

The emblem, which is reproduced with this article, was determined upon after a prize competition in which more than 250 designs were submitted. It is the combination of ideas submitted by David B. Hills, of Brooklyn, who won the first prize of $150, and Raphael Beck, of Buffalo, who was awarded the second prize of $50.

STANLEY TWIST BACK FROM AUSTRALIA.

Stanley H. Twist has reached Los Angeles en route from Australia. After two weeks' sojourn among friends and acquaintances, he will go to New York via Chicago, stopping over in the windy city to complete certain details now under way. Propositions have been made him for formation of a feature film manufacturing company along new and up-to-date lines, which will utilize certain patent rights, now granted and ready for operation. His New York address will be care Inter-Ocean Sales Co., 110 West 40th Street, New York City. Mr. Twist returns with feature films of value, which have been manufactured in Australia. Also contracts for exploitation of pictures in that country. Mr. Twist left New York in the latter part of 1913 to take the position of general manager of the Australasian Film Company at Sydney.

GRIFFITH'S adaptation from the stage version by Armstrong is characteristic in embellishing the story whenever and wherever an opportunity is afforded, intensifying it by methods of character contrast, and giving it new charm, but the director has gone further and endowed a rather morbid and commonplace play with some nobility of purpose. He takes pains to make his underworld scenes such strong ones that they are realistic in effect, terribly so at moments, but the true charm of his method is only revealed when he can appeal to the imagination, where beauty is a logical part of the picturing.

Scene from "The Escape" (Reliance).

Within a few years—perhaps in a few months—we will look back upon this period of adaptation, very much as we look back upon periods in the evolution of "pictura," with more relief than tolerance. We are adapting because of the uncertainty about original screen plays and because producers feel a greater sense of security when putting out something that has been on the stage, even if it failed. Hence adapters of ability are simply using old and crude material for reconstructive purposes, rather than for any actual renewal of stage plays. Some of the old material is good enough for a foundation, and it had better be kept there—out of sight. On this, a new structure, bearing the old title, may be raised by those who are gradually establishing methods for the new art.

Griffith is one of these. He has simply used "The Escape" for a ground plan and cellar walls, thereafter raising his own structure with the skill of a really great architect. When he comes to treat a big story to be built from the ground up for screen presentation, the same methods will serve with a vast amount of intrinsic structural beauty and strength added. As usual, he handles a small group, enough to be numbered on the fingers of one hand—the first five in the cast—and brings others on the screen for supporting or reactive purposes. Of this small group, Blanche Sweet carries off the honors, with Mae Marsh a close second in consistency and intelligent interpretation. Harron does some fine acting; Crisp is a perfect type, and Owen Moore does all that a perfect gentleman is permitted to do under the circumstances. The cast is nicely balanced, and the policemen shine as never before in the underworld plays. They look and act like the real thing. Miss Sweet is growing in subtlety, in refinement of interpretation, but her personality is, in itself, an effective contribution. She has caught the idea of discovering the combined childishness, wondrous cunning, and intense natural longings of womankind in a very charming way.

The story is that of the effect of improved environment. It shows, within certain limitations, that we could, if we always knew how, so enrich the soil in which the human plant grows, and cultivate it by proper nutrition, sunshine and care into finished results that would consign criminal courts and prisoners to the ash-heap. But this showing is only a whisper. Sociological plays are new, and it is no easy matter to make them so entertaining that the purpose will be felt, rather than unpleasantly obvious. Mr. Griffith is pursuing such a straight path in the right direction that what is worthy of approval in his plays overweighs his occasional mistakes to the extent of disarming adverse criticism. There is a ring of sincerity in his work and in the work of many others adapting stage plays that was never particularly conspicuous in the plays themselves.

Scene from "The Escape" (Reliance).

One can almost number sincere American dramatists on the fingers of one hand — surely on two hands — who have exhibited craftsmanship to rise into established place. Men like Bronson Howard, James A. Herne, David Belasco, Augustus Thomas, Percy Mackaye, William Gillette and Clyde Fitch, are all too rare. The stage has been given over to so much greed, slush and general inanity that people of intelligence rushed to the picture shows for relief. "The Escape" of their lives was made possible to millions, was made possible by the wordless drama that swept the country like a flood and caught most of the stage pretenders up in its swirl. Many who were simply clever enough to squeeze the old lemon dry in an effort to get all the juice there was in it are now profiting by revivals of their ancient fruit on the screen, and it must stagger them into a sense of pseudo-propriety to witness the artistic dressing of their past performances.

"The Escape" is being shown at the Cort Theater to very appropriate music, and constitutes a dignified contribution to the line of feature adaptations now in vogue.

"The Leopard's Foundling"

A Remarkable Two-Reel Animal Story Written and Produced by Miss Kathlyn Williams.

Reviewed by James S. McQuade.

AS A CLIMAX to the widespread vogue established by her in the Kathlyn series and in "The Spoilers," Miss Kathlyn Williams will shortly be seen in a two-reel Selig animal subject, the scenario of which was written by her, and the production made under her sole direction. As will be apparent to all who view these films, the story is quite original in its revelations of wild animal life, many of the incidents bordering on the fanciful nursery tales that made our eyes bulge out as we read or heard them told long ago.

Here we have a child wandering away from her parents in an African solitude, where they have pitched camp to rest, and finding a place to sleep in a cave, where a family of leopards have made their home. There she makes friends at once with the leopard children and their mother, and, being utterly lost to her parents and her kind, grows up with them until she is twenty-two years old. Instinctively, she finds it necessary to clothe herself for protection against the elements, her dress being fashioned out of tough grasses.

No wonder that young Stanley, the American hunter, who is exploring the African wilds in search of faunal specimens, is dazed by a fleeting glimpse of this graceful, barbarous nymph as she disappears like a flash in the underwood, her luxuriant hair and grass-made garments streaming behind her in her flight. He asks the headman of the natives, whom he has engaged for his hunting expedition, for information concerning this wonderful creature, and is told that she is the great white spirit, and that if she looks upon him he will die.

Nothing daunted, Stanley sets out next morning for the spot, accompanied by several white members of his party and the headman. True to his expectations, the wild girl, Balu, reappears, and, leaving his companions and the chief behind, he follows her through the underbrush, carrying in his hands a lariat to assist in catching her. He discovers the beautiful creature lying flat on the bank of a lake, scooping up water with her hands to quench her thirst, and succeeds in throwing a running noose over her upturned feet. There is a sharp, terrific conflict between the captive and himself; but he secures her, summons his companions and conveys her to the camp.

In the meantime, the native headman consults his followers and influences them to quit Stanley's service. Superstitious, they believe that the "great white spirit" is their friend, and the headman plans to avenge her and give her liberty.

In Stanley's camp Balu is an object of wonder to all; but she is more than that to Stanley, who tries to teach her civilized customs and the art of making herself understood by spoken words. Her progress is slow, but Stanley perseveres.

The defection of the natives interfered with the success of the hunting party, and one day Stanley set out to find the headman and hold a parley. He was ambushed by that worthy and his men, and securely bound. Then they carried him to the ledge in front of the leopard's cave, and left him as prey for the wild beasts.

Balu had already formed a liking for the companionship of the strange white man. On the day of his attack by the natives she followed him by her instinctive knowledge of trailing, and found him at the door of her old home. After severing his bonds, she began to caress two leopards which had come to the spot, hearing her voice. Stanley drew his revolver, fearing for her safety, but she reminded him that they were her friends. Then a struggle arose in her heart whether to go with her newly-found friend or remain with the old. The call of the race prevailed and she departed with Stanley.

A few months later Stanley and Balu arrive at his home in America. His mother and sister receive the wild girl fondly, and some humorous situations are revealed as they attempt to initiate her in the usages of refined society. In the end Stanley wins her heart and hand.

As a seven-year-old girl, Balu is represented by Baby Lillian Wade in charming fashion. To see this child playing gleefully with baby leopards in the big cave, while the mother looks on, sometimes snarlingly, will fill the beholder with wonder. It will be noticed that Baby Lillian never shows a sign of fear.

The characterization is assumed by Miss Williams when Balu is twenty-two years old. Here we see no baby leopards; they are all grown-ups, and Miss Williams handles them as if they were big pet cats. They submit to her caresses and, purringly, rub their spotted coats against her dress of grass, as they circle the spot she stands on.

The transition from the wild savage state of Balu to that in which civilization effects a subtle change is skillfully shown by Miss Williams. The fetters that civilization brings, in the shape of corsets and fashionable shoes, to poor Balu will excite numerous ripples of laughter.

Scene from "The Leopard's Foundling" (Selig).

As producer, Miss Williams can be commended for several imposing exterior scenes. The camp of Stanley, the attack made on him by the natives and the capture of Balu are scenes full of action, with fine backgrounds. The scene showing the interior of Stanley's home and what occurred there will be pronounced most appropriate. The animal scenes, already referred to, are really remarkable.

Stanley, the American hunter, is excellently represented by Charles Clary.

The release date has been set for June 29th.

"Cabiria" Shown on Broadway.

In the Splendid Knickerbocker Theater Itala's Great Twelve-Reeler Makes Its American Debut.

IT was an unusually enthusiastic house that greeted "Cabiria" on its first public American showing on the night of June 1. It was also the first occasion on which motion pictures had been shown in the Knickerbocker Theater, at Broadway and Thirty-eighth Street. This playhouse was one of the few remaining metropolitan temples of amusement that had not been invaded by the projecting machine. If the spontaneous and hearty applause that marked the big moments and the big scenes of "Cabiria" on the opening night may be taken as an indication of the favor of the great public, the twelve-reel film erected on the story of Gabriel D'Annunzio will have a long run at the Knickerbocker.

The gathering was more of the first-night description than of an orthodox picture gathering. The boxes to the left of the stage were decorated with American flags, while on those to the right were draped the colors of Italy. Behind the latter were Chevalier G. Fari Forna, Italian Consul General; Commander J. N. Francolini, and several representatives of the Italian Government. Others seen were Carlo Sciamengo, head of the Itala Film Company of Turin, Italy; Sir Arthur Conan Doyle, famous English writer, an adaptation of whose "House of Temperley" was recently shown at the Strand; Fire Commissioner Adamson, Siegmund Lubin, of Lubinville; Adolf Zukor, president of the Famous Players; Carl Laemmle, president of the Universal Company, accompanied by Mrs. Laemmle; Nicholas Power, president, and Edwin Earle, treasurer, of the Nicholas Power Company; Charles J. Hite, the Thanhouser Company; Harry Raver and Silvio Villa, of the Itala Company of America; John Bunny, with Mrs. Bunny; Herbert Brenon, Imp producer; Mark Dintenfass, Fred Mace, and Alan Hale.

The staging of "Cabiria" was in a manner befitting the dignity of the subject. The specially written music was interpreted by an orchestra of fifty or more pieces. A large chorus concealed on the stage gave several numbers during the course of the evening. The performance went without a hitch. There were two six-minute intermissions, during which there were animated discussions among the film men, there being entire agreement so far as noted that in "Cabiria" the Itala Company has eclipsed all previous efforts in spectacular production.

To say that never before had such a presentation of a motion picture been given in this country seems well within the bounds of conservative statement. The magnitude and the manner of presentation of the production, as well as its musical accompaniment, both instrumental and vocal, justify the remark.

"The Perils of Pauline."

Sixth Episode. Two Reels. Eclectic.

Reviewed by W. Stephen Bush.

THE further troubles of Pauline are harrowing enough to melt the heart of an ordinary villain, but then the head villain in these films is far above the average in villainy. The synopsis tells us that in this new attempt to secure Pauline's fortune, "the two villains are desperate." Pauline, sweet and girlish, and fetching enough to tempt a score or two of ordinary villains, wandering about among flowers in a charming summer gown has come out of her previous perils not only without a scratch, but seems positively improved for all the horrors she has passed through.

There is notice of a balloon ascension in the early part of the first reel and Pauline, her sweetheart and the villain decide to be present. Of course, the villain has laid a devilish plot. Knowing that in her girlish vivacity, Pauline will want to sit in the balloon he has a sub-villain ready to ride into the midst of the crowd, just as Pauline is all alone in the seat. Promptly the balloon is released, and there is poor Pauline soaring above the Palisades apparently doomed to perish, or at least soil her summer finery in a bad landing. Sure enough, the anchor catches in some rocks. Pauline is now on the steep side of the Palisades and how will she ever get down? Simply enough—she slides down the rope. Presently, Harry, the lover, guesses the predicament of Pauline—why not?—and comes to her rescue. Tying a rope to his car he descends to the place where his Pauline lies somewhat ruffled, but by no means out of the running.

Scene from "The Perils of Pauline" (Eclectic).

Just as things look pretty good for Harry and Pauline the villains arrive in another car and, without a trace of compunction, cut the rope, hurling Harry down the cliff. Harry is badly shaken up, but he recovers and the lovers are on the point of escaping when a horrible unkempt villain, heavily masked, simply grabs Pauline and runs off with her. He is not only a pre-eminent villain, but a good weight carrier, and the end of the episode finds Pauline in the villain's power. Harry is unconscious when the announcement of the approval of the Board of Censors brings the reel to an end. There is a glimpse of hope. A farmer has seen the abduction of Pauline. But for this we would fear the worst.

GOLDFISH ON HIS WAY TO EUROPE.

Samuel Goldfish, the executive head of the Jesse L. Lasky Feature Play Company, sailed May 30 on the Olympic, for a three months' stay in Europe. While abroad, Mr. Goldfish will consummate the plans he has been working on, looking forward to the distribution of big American moving picture features, which, since the recent alliance with Mr. Belasco, means the exploitation of the Belasco productions there, as well as the other Lasky creations.

PAUL ARMSTRONG and Wilson Mizner collaborated on a play called "The Greyhound," a combination of detective and underworld plot, and described at the time of its production at the Astor Theater, New York, as an expose of transatlantic gambling methods. As a legitimate production, "The Greyhound" was not without interest, and, while it was not a dismal failure, neither was it a pronounced success, and it was closed after a few weeks' run. Recently the Life Photo Film Corporation secured the right to produce this play in pictures, and, after witnessing a screen presentation at the American Theater, Friday, May 29th, it is the belief of the writer that a marked success has been scored by the picture men who made it, and that the photoplay version of "The Greyhound" will take an important place among the current feature productions.

It was a distinctly friendly audience that filled the orchestra seats of the American Theater on the occasion of the first presentation, and the frequent applause which greeted favorite players who appear in the cast could not be wholly credited to the production; but, judged by the rules, "The Greyhound" possesses, to a large degree, the prime requisites of a successful motion picture: a complete story, consistently and interestingly told, intelligent interpretation by competent players, careful direction and adequate staging, and, finally, good photography.

For the story as arranged for the picture, Louis Reeves Harrison is responsible. Those who saw the result of Mr. Harrison's work on the scenario for the All-Star production of "Paid in Full" did not hesitate to credit him with an even greater triumph in his treatment of "The Greyhound." It was Mr. Harrison's task to create interest in a commonplace subject, and to make that interest strong enough to hold through five reels of film, bridging over the gaps and making the "punches" punch. That he succeeded was proved best by the fact that at no time did action drag or interest fag.

It would not be fair to attribute all the good work in this picture to the scenario writer. Lawrence McGill was the director, and picture men generally know that he can do things when he has something to do them with. In this instance he had a good scenario to guide him and a company of competent players to interpret the parts. The cast given herewith contains many well-known names; some of them were in the play when it was produced at the Astor Theater; all of them gave excellent interpretations. Add to these advantages the possibilities for scenic effects in motion picture portrayal, and the reason is found why "The Greyhound" as a picture production will be successful where the dramatic effort on the speaking stage was not. The carefulness of detail in settings, the selection of adequate scenic effects—many of them exceedingly beautiful—the disposition of the players and the accentuation of the dramatic moments are incidents in the production of a photoplay for which the director is responsible. In this respect, Mr. McGill has acquitted himself with honor.

The central action of "The Greyhound" concerns the affairs of a gambler named Louis Fellman, known to the underworld as the "greyhound," and his wife, Claire. Associated with Fellman are J. Crawford Alexander, a gambler; Jack Fay, a crook, and Kitty Doyle, alias "Deep Sea Kitty," a confidence woman. Fellman has about deserted his wife for his gambling operations, and when his "joint" is raided he falls easily for the suggestion that it is his wife who has "tipped off" the police. About the same time he learns of the sailing of Mrs. Porter Allen and family, with the further information that Mrs. Allen's son, Porter, will be easy picking. He summons his gang and announces his plans—all are to go with him, but how to get rid of his wife is a problem. In Fellman's face is depicted a determination to do something desperate as he goes to see her. He finds her in a mood suitable for his purpose—she is contemplating suicide; so, when he enters and tells her that he has killed a man and that his only escape is to shoot himself, she suggests that they die together and offers the poison which she previously procured for her own self-destruction. He acquiesces and craftily watches her drain her glass and then leaves her, as he believes, to die. It is shown, subsequently, that she does not die, and that it is her accusing face, coupled with a nemesis in the form of the man she should have married, McSherry, a reformed card sharp and detective, that drives Fellman to his doom.

Fitting into this central theme is the love story of Bess Allen and Bob Meade, whose affair is not approved by Mrs. Allen.

What with the scheming of the gamblers, the espionage of McSherry who foils them at every turn and finally denounces them to the ship's officers, interest runs high to the climax when Fellman, in an effort to escape arrest is confronted by his wife whom he believes dead. It is the last straw and his overwrought nerves give way—he jumps over the side to escape the apparition.

There is a satisfactory ending, which brings McSherry and Claire Fellman together through the kind offices of Bob and Bess.

Adequate mention of the several players cannot be given in the limited space allotted to this review. W. H. Tooker as Fellman, Catherine Carter as his wife, and Elita Proctor Otis as "Deep Sea Kitty," stand out strongly because of their excellent interpretations. The support given by other members of the company is highly creditable.

Sid Olcott Going Abroad

Will Take His Company on Tour Through England and Ireland and Southern Europe.

OFF for Europe on June 11th! That is the word from Sid Olcott, the globe trotter-producer. "Sid," as his friends call him, has a remarkable reputation as an international producer, having made with unusual success feature films in fourteen countries, always finding new friends and getting everything that was best for his stories. Mr. Olcott's name is not as well known as are the names of his many successful productions, since until the first of this year he has worked for others, and the pictures have been presented with only those on the inside of filmdom aware of the brains behind the cameraman. This year Mr. Olcott took his own company to Florida with beautiful Valentine Grant, a charming personality, as leading woman, and there he made a most successful series of subjects which are being released by Warner's Features, Inc. Mr. Olcott is now working on some international productions, part of which will be produced in this country, part on the high seas, and part in foreign countries, the same characters appearing throughout the stories.

Mr. Olcott's company, headed by Miss Grant, will sail on the Adriatic on June 11, and will stop first in England, where a few weeks will be spent making some scenes in London, on the Cornish coast, and in the English provinces. The company will then go to Ireland for two months or longer, taking scenes in Dublin and other cities, in the beautiful Vale of Avoca, in the county of Wicklow; on and around the wonderfully beautiful Lakes of Killarney, and, in fact, in all the fascinating spots of the Ould Sod.

Sid Olcott.

In the fall the company will spend some time in France and then will either return to the States or spend the winter in Italy and the other picturesque countries of Southern Europe. Having been through all these European countries producing on several occasions, Mr. Olcott is in a position to do some great things for "Sidfilms," since he has a host of friends in practically every foreign land who know him and love him just as do his hundreds of staunch admirers in this country.

One announcement which will be of especial interest to the exhibitors in this country is that Mr. Olcott intends on the present trip to appear in the films in person to a greater extent than ever before. Mr. Olcott is as good an actor as he is a director, which is a statement with some meaning, and there has been a constant demand for years that he appear more in his own productions. F. C. Gunning, formerly of Eclair and Warner's Features, will accompany Mr. Olcott as assistant director. The remainder of the company will be made up of artists who have worked with Mr. Olcott in his scores of successes, Miss Grant playing the leads.

Mr. Olcott and Miss Grant have both arranged to be at the exposition for the first three days of the week in order to meet their exhibitor friends. Mr. Olcott has long been known as a producer of 100 per cent. features, particularly on account of the consistency of his work, and it is needless to say that some exceptional results are expected by his friends from the trip this summer.

The Opening of The Panama Canal

Hagy's Features Show a Four-Part Subject Containing Some of the Biggest Moments in a Big Project.

Reviewed by George Blaisdell.

WE have had good pictures before of the Panama Canal. When E. H. Hagy went to the canal country he was aware of this fact, and determined to get something unusual. He knew that in order to get that he would necessarily have to camp on the trail, as it were, of the canal, and that is what Mr. Hagy did. He was in the Zone over six months. The result of his stay has been compressed into four reels of motion pictures, the first thousand feet of which are devoted to scenes in Panama City. There are views of the drawing of the Panama Lottery, which show the interest of humankind in games of chance. One of the most interesting sights of the first reel is that of the Panama market at high tide and also at low tide; many craft are lined up side by side as the tide sets for its twenty-two-foot drop. When the water has receded the boats are on land that is, if not dry, at least solid, and the whole town turns out to do its marketing. There are also views of civic celebrations.

The second reel opens with views of the Naos Island Breakwater, extending out to the three islands on which are erected the fortifications which will defend the entrance of the canal. We get a glimpse of the unique track-shifting apparatus, invented during the construction of the canal, which is estimated to do the work of 600 men. As Mr. Hagy says, this has been shown before, but there are a whole lot of persons who have never seen a picture of it. One notable scene is that of the flooding of the Culebra Cut, the nine-mile-long ditch. As one after another of the twenty-six-inch pipes are loosed the water flows into the area from which previously it had been pumped.

There is a stirring picture of the blowing up of the Gamboa Dike as President Wilson in Washington touches a button. After the planting of the explosive a number of small craft gather as near as their operators dare, ready for the attempt to make the first passage through the excavation. There is a difference in level between the waters on opposite sides of ten feet. After the upheaval the first boat through is a little native canoe, manned by a United States marine and operated by a regulation paddle. He carries one passenger. The little craft bobs about in the torrent, but comes safely through.

Then we see the drilling for deepening the canal bed near the Pacific entrance, and note the vigor with which the dynamite is jammed into the underwater pockets prepared for it. We see the kick of sixteen tons of dynamite distributed through 504 holes and then another trial of thirteen tons.

There are several interesting pictures of the last slide at Cucaracha. The first was taken just after the slip, and the last are when enough earth has been excavated to permit the big dredges to work.

Perhaps the most popular of these series of pictures will be the views of the little tug Gatun making the initial passage of the three divisions of the Gatun Lock. After looking at these no one will be in doubt as to the method of lifting a ship eighty-five feet above the level of the sea. When one considers the many years this work has been under way and the immense amount of blood and treasure it has cost the excitement of the throngs that lined the walls of the docks is easily understood. There are many other views of prominent points along this great way, some of them ranging for great distances.

Mr. Hagy has given us a picture the value of which will increase with the years. It contains many scenes that can never be taken again. It will be of great interest to the present generation; it will be of far deeper interest to those to come after.

"UNDER SOUTHERN SKIES."

Lottie Blair Parker's "Under Southern Skies," that famous old play, will soon be seen in motion pictures. Arrangements have just been completed by Popular Plays and Players, of 1600 Broadway, New York, for its production as a feature picture. It will be produced on a mammoth scale by the Lubin Film Manufacturing Company at its various studios.

"Atlantis"

A Six-Part Great Northern Subject Based Upon Gerhart Hauptmann's Story of the Same Title.

GERHART HAUPTMANN is one of the most distinguished writers of the present day. Among other books written by him is one entitled "Atlantis," said to be a novel of exceptional strength. It occurred to the Great Northern Film Company, of Copenhagen, that a motion picture based upon an important work of so renowned an author as Hauptmann should prove of more than usual interest to the world and, it is said, that company went to great lengths to secure the consent of the author to the production in pictures, including the payment of a considerable sum of money for the privilege. The judgment of the Great Northern Company seems to have been justified, for the picture "Atlantis" has had a considerable vogue in various countries where it has been shown and has yielded to the makers a large profit.

Although "Atlantis" has been out for fully a year and shown in almost every country on the globe, it has yet to be released for the United States, the reason being that, in its original form, it was hardly adapted for this market. Accordingly changes have been made in the subject, bringing it within a length suitable for the demand and eliminating much material that lacked interest or was otherwise inconsistent. The result is a six-part picture fairly up to the required standard and one that will hold attention in almost any house.

Scene from "Atlantis" (Great Northern).

The title does not convey any meaning, beyond that the principal scenes of the picture were taken from the book of that name. The story told on the film is that of a young doctor, unnerved by his wife's illness (she goes insane), who has been advised by a friend in the profession to take a trip abroad for his health. He first goes to Berlin, where he meets a famous dancer with whom he becomes slightly infatuated. But he quickly tires of this diversion and decides to go to America. Taking passage on the steamship Roland he finds the dancer aboard and renews the acquaintance. The ship strikes a sunken derelict and is wrecked and many of its passengers are drowned. The young doctor (his name is Kammacher) succeeds in saving himself and bringing the dancer, Ingegerd Halstrom, safely off the sinking ship with him. The survivors eventually reach New York and are met by friends at the dock.

Dr. Kammacher is taken in hand by his friend Dr. Schmidt and, in the course of seeing New York, meets Miss Burns, a young woman who is a sculptress at the studio of a friend of Dr. Schmidt's. Kammacher's health does not improve and Dr. Schmidt proposes to take him to his hunting lodge in the mountains. While there Kammacher learns of the death of his wife and then he breaks down completely and is prostrated by a serious illness. He convalesces rapidly under the nursing of Miss Burns, who comes to take care of him when she learns of his illness and, eventually, he takes her back home with him as his wife.

The thrilling scene of the picture is the wreck of the Roland and the panic among the passengers as the doomed ship sinks. This is a strong bit of realism and is convincing to a degree that haunts the mind. Bits of comedy are injected here and there which liven the picture up. A performance by the armless wonder, in the character of Arthur Stoss, who is exceptionally clever with his feet is amusing. There are many beautiful natural scenes, heightened by the excellent photography of the Great Northern.

THE NEW SIMPLEX CATALOGUE.

This office is in receipt of the new 1914 catalogue of the Precision Machine Company, of New York, devoted to the manufacture and sale of the Simplex projecting machine.

As an example of high-grade printing it ranks at the top. A finer job of cover embossing was never done. The color is a neutral gray of strong fiber stock, deckle-edged, with all lettering of a dark, steel gray, so nicely embossed that the letters appear to have been stuck on. The inside forms are printed on a highly calendered enamel book stock of good weight. The text matter is printed in a good black ink with a border around each page printed in a solid light blue. The printer's mark shows the catalogue to be the work of the Read Printing Company, New York.

The Simplex catalogue was compiled chiefly by J. E. Robin, the well-known projection expert and former traveling representative of the Precision Machine Company. Between Mr. Robin and the printers, this book may be admitted as a work of art. It is large in size, 9 x 12, and contains 28 pages of highly useful matter pertaining to projection in general, and to Simplex projection in particular. Every possible form of data that will be of service to the users of Simplex machines has been included, such as separate views of all principal castings and parts, photographed from several angles, with all borings numbered to agree with explanatory matter which really explains. In all, there are forty-six expert illustrations of the Simplex projector, mostly of the mechanism.

There many new halftone views of the interior of the factory, showing the up-to-date machinery used in the manufacture of the Simplex machine. There is a page devoted to the use of calcium light in connection with a projector; two pages of endorsements; an excellent and original table for calculating the size of screen images from the various sizes of lenses. The last page is devoted to the Simplex motion picture camera.

NEW COMPANY TO PRODUCE WILD ANIMAL PICTURES.

The Nash Motion Picture Company has been organized by Mr. Thos. Nash and Mr. Otto to specialize in wild animal pictures. The construction of a large studio at Los Angeles is being pushed forward and a shipment of wild animals is already in quarters in the Zoo on the "Big Otto" Ranch. Wild animals will be used in all their productions, which will be from four to six reels in length. From their previous experience in animal pictures, the promoters of the company expect to eclipse anything heretofore seen in this class of picture productions.

"The Outcast's Return."

A Three-Part Great Northern Offering Far Above the Average Picture in Merit—Its Humanity Pulls at the Heart.

Reviewed by Hanford C. Judson.

THE real future of the picture business stands firmly on offerings of such quality as we find in "The Outcast's Return," by the Great Northern Studio. One sees many pictures that have no art at all; here is one that is all art. "But," it is even possible that some producer will say, "the people don't want art; they can't appreciate it." The true beauty of the art that all will enjoy in this offering is that it asks for no appreciating. The ideal glass for a window through which one is to look out into the world would be a glass that no one could see. Such a glass would not ask to be noticed; the beauty of it would be that we wouldn't know that it was there. Just so in this picture, no one will see art. All the inconsistencies have been brushed away and what we see is or seems to be real life. This simple thing of it is true. Its author and producer, as far as was possible to them, have worked together until all those things that lie about the human heart's experience, or that distract the spectator's attention from his story, have been eliminated. What they have put on the screen is a series of scenes giving the experience of a human soul and they have carefully chosen those scenes so that all will throw some new light on that experience. No doubt the "Outcast" had other troubles than have been shown; but these weren't significant just at this time and artfully have been left out.

Scene from "The Outcast's Return" (Gt. Northern).

The Outcast is no hero, just a human soul. He was tried and fell, stole some gems to help his family and went through a terrible punishment for it. The producer hasn't pitied his man; hasn't intruded his own partial feelings on the spectator, but has presented the facts in the terms of human feeling and has wisely left the spectator to do his own pitying as his temperament sees fit. This is the wisest course; for we, the spectators, are of all kinds, and the producer's kind of feeling over the facts might not have fitted us all. The producer's eyes see the facts just as our eyes see them and this collection of scenes out of the life of this unfortunate give us a knot in the throat; we gulp.

The picture's producer has chosen serious things and his picture is tragic. If there is any picture house whose patrons are never serious and have no stomachs for solid food, or if they are never interested in the sufferings of their own hearts, then this is not the best kind of a picture for them. We, the reviewer, don't believe there is any such house and our experience leads us to commend the picture highly, alike for the least and the most critical kind of general audience. It is a human picture for all humanity. It seemed actual to us, even as real life, yet deep and full of mystery. For it is tragic with a more comprehensive reckoning than would take in merely what the man felt; it is tragic with all that unthinking, senseless hardness of heart of the normal man and woman who hasn't stolen or been in prison. Such a terrible prison it is. There is no brutality of the passionate kind in it. The keepers are even sympathetic. Yet the calm, social, passionless brutality of it, makes it a hell, a calm hell of silence where dreams alone come as torturers. Dreams can torture. They torture this man until, after thirty years of it, he is pardoned.

He is pardoned out into a world of automobiles and aeroplanes and many wonders that he has never dreamed of. He is like a child in a strange world of terrors and he comes home to his kind—his sister. She has grown old and has children and grandchildren. The calm calculating brutality of these people—why should they be kind to him? they had never seen him—is worse than the prison. The sister's love is brushed aside. We may say that we wouldn't behave that way; but we are not always sincere and we know it when we see the picture, even if it is later quickly hidden from us for comfort's sake. The Outcast goes back to beg an asylum in the prison; but he has been freed and must suffer in the world. At the end he dies in a lonely wood, of exhaustion and shock.

The most noteworthy fact of this picture is its simplicity. In the acting of its leading character, it reaches heights of simplicity. There are no frills or passion or attempts to make the spectator feel emotion in this man's acting. All he cares for is to be true, satisfied to let the story do its work in our feelings and not over-anxious to have us recognize his great work. His work is recognized in the pleasure it gives. Without losing anything of admiration for him, we still feel that he is a human being like ourselves.

FAMOUS PLAYERS ENGAGE PAULINE FREDERICK.

The Famous Players' Film Company, through Adolph Zukor, its president, has engaged Pauline Frederick, one of the prominent stars of the American stage, who is to be presented in a feature film production of Hall Caine's master work, "The Eternal City," to be produced in Italy. This engagement is one of the most significant ever made between a film concern and a legitimate artiste.

Miss Frederick will sail on the Imperator on Saturday, June 6, to join Messrs. Porter and Ford, who have been in Europe for some weeks past, producing the feature motion picture of "Monsieur Beaucaire," by Booth Tarkington, with James K. Hackett in the stellar role. Miss Frederick is one of the best known emotional actresses of the modern stage, and has achieved distinction in a series of dramatic successes, most prominent among them being "The Little Gray Lady," "The Dollar Mark," "The Fourth Estate," "The Music Master," "Samson," "Twenty Days in the Shade," and more recently, "Joseph and His Brethren."

"The Eternal City" ranks as one of the literary achievements of the past century, and has been printed in every modern language and circulated throughout the entire civilized world. The environment and atmosphere of Rome and the classic backgrounds of this ancient city lend themselves admirably to a film portrayal of this famous subject.

"Brother Against Brother"

Apex—Four Parts.

Reviewed by W. Stephen Bush.

THIS production has a peculiar charm and a very strong appeal. The charm lies in the novelty of the subject. The kinematograph has before this shown us all too little of life among the Slavonic races. Life in these countries is intense, often tragic. It has a pathos and beauty wholly its own, often weird and always attractive.

In these films the story of two hostile brothers is told. They have become estranged through their affection for the same girl. There is a deep antipathy between the race of the lover and the race of the girl, rooted in the traditions and wars of many centuries. Love makes the barrier disappear and the younger of the Polish nobleman finds a haven of happiness in the thatched cottage of his Russian bride. All this is shown with uncommon art in these films. There is a depth of characterization, a finish of detail which must delight every spectator. Presently war is declared between the hostile countries and the younger brother must decide whether he will join the army of his old fatherland or fight with the enemies of his country. He resists the appeal of his father to return to his people in a scene of rare dramatic power, in which the wife and child plead against father and country. Though unwilling to make war upon the kin of his wife and child he will not on the other hand fight the men of his own blood. Fate, however, wills otherwise and forces him from his neutrality. He is forced to act as a guide for his wife's people and when the Russian patrol is put to flight by an advance of Polish troops he falls into the hands of a command in charge of his own brother. Here the play takes a tragic turn. The convention of a happy ending is I think rationally sacrificed to the dramatic probabilities.

The acting in this play is exceptionally fine, all the principal characters showing not only uncommon skill before the camera, but possession engaging and suitable personalities. The photography is far above the ordinary, the direction will compare favorably with the very best.

LILIE LESLIE.

LILIE LESLIE of the Lubin Stock Company is a native of Australia from which country she migrated to England and later to America. Being much advised of Lilie's travels and activities her mother was extremely anxious to see her daughter on the silent screen. Lately, she learned that Lilie had played Mrs. Howard Jeffries, a powerful role in "The Third Degree." One night the photoplay was billed to be seen at the Crystal Place, Sydney, and mother was crazy to see the picture. On arriving at the play house, she was informed that the house was full. Her disappointment was so intense that she requested to see the manager, who, upon hearing her story, gave her a chair out of his office. As the girl appeared upon the screen the mother voiced a scream of recognition and later gave expressions of joy at every scene. It was evidently one of the happiest events of her life. Miss Leslie will be seen in a strong melodramatic picture entitled "The Pythoness' which will soon be released by the Lubin Company and mother will doubtless have another thrill.

ATSCO OPENS NEW FACTORY NEAR NEW YORK.

Having worked their factory in St. Louis day and night for some time to keep up with the orders for their Radium Gold Fibre Screen, Atsco, Inc., are opening a new factory at 15-23 Halsted Street, East Orange, New Jersey. The new factory, shown in accompanying illustration, has 15,000 square feet of floor space and will enable them to double their present capacity for their very successful screen. This factory is being completely equipped and will have facilities to turn out screens of all sizes. Walter Hoff Seely, Chairman of the Board of Directors of Atsco, Inc., says the reason for the approval of their screen by Keith's and the Strand Theater and a multitude of others is due to the fact "that their golden surface blends with the yellow light of the picture machine arc and the result is a perfect picture with no eye-strain."

Dramatizing the Song

Charles K. Harris, Music Publisher, Tells How He Always Writes a Play Before Composing a Song.

By George Blaisdell.

ONE of the closest of students of motion pictures is Charles K. Harris, song composer and music publisher for more than twenty years. Mr. Harris is a firm believer in the necessity of a strong story for either the stage or the screen—"The play's the thing." So also he has the best of reason for understanding how much stronger a song is when it has a story behind it. Years ago Mr. Harris aspired to be a playwright; he didn't succeed in just the way he had dreamed of winning out, but he has never lost his deep interest in the stage, and more recently he has become a follower of the screen. In the beginning of 1893 Mr. Harris was living in Milwaukee. He had a little office where he gave banjo lessons. In his spare time he had written a play. The name will be recognized—"After the Ball." There was slim chance out there for its acceptance. He turned that play into a song. Then things began to happen. One of those things among many others was told the writer the other day in the course of a call on the music man in his office at Broadway and Forty-seventh Street. We had just taken a big comfortable arm-chair, as it had been vacated by a caller.

"He's a bond salesman," commented Mr. Harris. "Been coming here four years in spite of the fact he has never sold me anything. He says he'll catch me in the mood some day. And that reminds me of my first experience in a bond deal. It was the summer of '93. You will recall that real money was somewhat scarce—in fact, there was a panic. It didn't happen to be for me, though. I was handling more currency than I had ever expected to see. Orders were coming in for 'After the Ball.' The song was selling for 19 cents—not like the present, when 6 cents is nearer the prevailing rate—and it cost me a half cent to print. The money was coming in literally in chunks—that was the way it seemed to me, who had never had any. There were orders of a hundred thousand. I knew nothing about business, but a friend had said something about 19 cents, and that settled it; I refused to take anything less. There was one month I took in $40,000. This income was all put away in a vault. You see, I was a little uneasy about banks just at the time. There must have been ten packs in that vault of ten thousand each. Nobody in the town knew how things were going with me—not even my own family.

"A friend dropped into the office one day and said he would like to have me come out to his home that evening and bring my banjo. He added that there would be a five-spot in it for me. I knew he had a brother who was a cashier in one of the big banks, and thought it would be a good chance to meet him. I accepted the job. After I had pocketed the five I asked my friend if he would introduce me to his brother. 'Why, of course.' Arrangements were then made for me to call at the bank the next afternoon for advice about investments. I knew the cashier was under the impression he was merely doing a little politeness. At 3:15 I walked into the cashier's office and asked him: 'What is the best investment in the world?' 'A Government bond,' he replied in some surprise. 'How much do they cost?' I continued. 'A thousand dollars, but they pay a low rate. There is one you can buy for a thousand and fifty which will pay fairly well.'

"'Very well,' I replied. 'I want some.'

"He looked at me in rather sympathetic manner and said softly: 'How many would you like?'

"'Oh, about seventy-five, I think.'

"I knew by the way he looked what he thought—that the heat or something like that had got me. Nevertheless, he was game. He called in a strapping big fellow and told him to take a satchel and go with me. 'And,' he added, significantly, to the guardian, 'come back with him.'

"I wish you could have seen the face on that banker when we returned. The big fellow threw the satchel on the cashier's desk and opened it. As Nash got a glimpse of the eighty thousand it contained his face went white. 'Where'd you get it, Harris?' he said.

"'Why,' I replied. 'I have just written a song.'

"He looked at me in despair. It was perhaps, from his viewpoint, the worst thing I could have said. I convinced him before long, though, that it was all right. And I got the bonds, too, after a wait of a couple of weeks."

In the twenty years that have passed since the first hit, Mr. Harris has published more than 150 songs of his own composition. In all of these he has never lost sight of the story, and in many he has first prepared the plot in synopsis form, just as if he were about to write a play. "I can dramatize all of my songs," he said. "It is very simple, because the story is there. Running through 'After the Ball,' which and in which Herbert Kelcey and Effie Shannon are to play the leads, there is a beautiful love story, and this picture can be shown in a church." Other songs that will be filmed by the Photo Drama Company are: "'Mid the Green Fields of Virginia," "For Old Times' Sake" and "Break the News to Mother."

Speaking of the last-named song, Mr. Harris said it was published some time before the outbreak of the Spanish War. It had just an average sale. Then came the destruction of the Maine. Immediately the calls for it began to come in. Recently, Mr. Harris said, it has had a decided revival owing to the Mexican troubles.

"I feel the time is coming," said the song writer, "when the public will tire of screen adaptations of old plays. Surely, the day is coming when the list will be practically exhausted. Then we will have to have original material—and that will be the period of the screen writer. Right now, I question the business value or screen value from a monetary standpoint of a play that has failed. Personally, when I see advertised a picture adapted from a play I didn't like, I steer clear of it. I don't want to see it. Of course, that's only one opinion. But in time we have got to come to new ideas. Take, for illustration, 'Neptune's Daughter,' the Universal picture. There's a novelty, and people are going to see it. So, too, are the spectacular productions, like Kleine's. The big men in the picture business are right now willing to pay big money for real new ideas. The story, the theme, the action, is paramount. I have published sixty-five musical comedies, and I know the first essential in that branch of amusement is the music. Your costumes, scenery, etc., come after. The play's the thing for the drama, the music for the musical show. The man who originates intelligently is the man who wins to-day in any line. And that kind of originality you have got to pay for.
